DR. KERR REPORTS ON OREGON HIGHER EDUCATIONAL PLAN.

CHICAGO, Ill.—The success or failure of any system of administering state supported higher education depends, in the final analysis, on the spirit that animates the organization rather than on the details of the machinery involved, Dr. W. J. Kerr, chancellor of Oregon's higher educational system, told a convention of university educators here.

Dr. Kerr, who has been a college president for 33 years, was invited to discuss Oregon's experience with her new unification plan in an address before the National Association of American Universities, which this year devoted its program largely to the theme, "Recent Experiences with Centralized Control of Higher Education."

Much interest has been shown nationally in Oregon's experiment which has been pronounced by educators as constituting one of the most revolutionary reorganizations of a state system of higher education ever attempted. Dr. Kerr explained the idea back of the Oregon plan, which, he said, provides machinery for almost complete coordination of functions.

While pointing out that ultimate success will depend on the spirit of those concerned with the new organization, Dr. Kerr paid a tribute to the members of the state board that have been laboring to bring order and progress into the new system. He said they have proceeded with the idea that their first step was not a finished product, and that changes are being made as experience dictates.

Unification of Oregon's six institutions has extended even to nearly complete coordination of research and extension activities, yet the board has been careful to preserve the individual identities of each institution. Despite drastic reduction in income, no institution has been eliminated or seriously limited in function, he reported.

Valuable "by-products" of the unification plan, he said, have been the adoption of uniform entrance requirements, uniform regulations regarding non-resident students, uniform fees and health services, a single library system, centralized informational and publication services and cooperative management of the physical plants.
