PEA CANNING SEASON HERE: SPECIALIST GIVES POINTERS.

With the pea canning season about at its height in the homes of western Oregon, Miss Lucy Case, extension specialist in foods and nutrition at Oregon State college, offers a few pointers for handling this task in the easiest and most successful manner.

Two hours from garden to can is a good rule to follow in canning green peas, Miss Case says. The shorter the time the more of the sweet natural flavor will be retained because the sugar in peas quickly turns to starch after they are picked.

Use only young, tender peas, she advises, and wash them carefully. They may be shelled by hand, but many find it quicker to dip them in hot water and run them, stem end first through the wringer of the washing machine, or through a special pea sheller. The pods go through the wringer and the peas fall back and are caught on a clean cloth in the tub. Even though shelled by hand, the task is easier if the pods are first dipped in hot water, Miss Case says.

For canning peas, and all other non-acid vegetables for that matter, packing hot into the jars and using a pressure cooker is the only method recommended for safety, according to Miss Case. Bring the peas to boil in water to cover, she says, and in the mean time boil the jars, lids and rubbers. Fill the jars, while they are sitting in boiling water, to within ½ inch of the top with the boiling hot peas. Then fill the jars also to within ½ inch of the top with the liquid in which the peas were cooked. Add ½ teaspoon salt to each pint of peas.

Containers larger than pint jars or No. 2 cans are not recommended for peas, she points out. Most types of modern jars can be sealed immediately after filling with the hot food before processing, she says, but wire clamp jars seem to be exceptions to this rule at times. Sealing before processing keeps the liquid in the jars. Screw band jars should be retightened after processing.

Place the hot jars in the pressure cooker with boiling water ½ inch over the rack and the pet cock open, she says. Fasten the top of the cooker and leave the pet cock open. Let the stem escape for five minutes, then close the pet cock and bring the pressure to 10 pounds. Proocess pint jars 45 minutes, quart jars 55 minutes, and No. 2 and 2½ cans 45 minutes at 10 pounds pressure. When the time is up, turn off the heat and let the pressure return to zero, and then wait a minute or so before opening the pet cock gradually. When the sound of air going into the cooker is no longer heard open the cooker. When boiling stops inside the jars, remove them from the cooker and cool away from a draft.
