Cinch Long Shot

By MATTIE RAMSON

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

EVER hear o' Long Shot Betty Lou? No? Never heard o' Chico Creek, either, I guess. Well, Long Shot Betty Lou and Chico Creek runs together, 'cause it's gonna be a long time 'fore she forgets Chico Creek. Guess you're wonderin' where the connection comes in, huh?

Her name was Betty Lou Merideth and you could see her at the track every day the horses were runnin'. Now, chances are if she bet on favorites, they'd call her Sure Shot Betty, but Betty went for nothin' but long shots. Weights, sires, mammys, jockeys, weather or track conditions didn't mean a thing to Betty. She only wanted to know the price on the horses. When she put her money down she wanted to get a lot of dough back or no sale.

"One's as good as another," she'd say with a cute little twist of her shoulders. "They're all in there to win, and it might be one as well as the other."

So she'd pick the best of the long shots and put five on it to win. Five bucks was her limit, and she only played 'em in front. Second or third money didn't interest her. Figured if she hit one a week, she's made a week's salary. Up to date she's been doin' pretty good. Good enough to pay the rent for a swell apartment and drive around in a new eight cylinder wagon.

Betty Lou puts five on Wise Lady to win at twenty to one. The only horse in the race that paid a bigger price was Baggage Man at fifty to one, an' the only reason she didn't play him is because it's his first time out in two weeks. In case it makes any difference, I'm playing Ebony Queen, the favorite, at two to one, who looks like a dead bang cinch to beat the race. So Wise Lady wins an' they're still waitin' for Ebony Queen to come in.

Seems like there's only one other person around the track that put any dough on Wise Lady, and Betty Lou runs into him at the pay off window. It don't take long for 'em to get acquainted and this guy starts callin' on her every night. They're hittin' all the high spots in town. Oh, yeah, his name is Ted Ainsley.

In the next two weeks they're seein' plenty of each other. She likes him, for which I don't blame her, 'cause he's a nice lookin' young fellow who looks like he's got a lot of what it takes to get along. (I mean dough). Ted, he must be in love with her, or he sure wouldn't give her the play he does. Can't blame him either, 'cause she sure is something very pleasant to look at.

He don't do much talkin' except to let her know that he comes from Chico Creek, Calif., a little town of about four thousand population. He does tell her that he was runnin' some kind of rug business for his daddy, but she don't pay much attention, 'cause just about when he mentioned that, Whiskaway was comin' down the stretch two lengths in front and Betty had five on his nose at fifty to one. Don't get any ideas in your head that the horse was beat. It win the race with plenty to spare. Nothing else near it.

Pretty soon it comes time for Ted to go back to Chico Creek and go to work. His vacation time is up, he tells her, and if he don't get back he'll forget how to make rugs and maybe lose his job.

They're sittin' in Sardo's, the best spot in town, and havin' a cocktail or two in between dances, when all of a sudden Ted leans over and takes hold of her hand in his and tells her how much he loves her and wants to take her back with him to Chico Creek as his wife.

Betty starts laughin'. "Why, Ted," she says, "don't be silly. Excuse me for laughin', won't you? It's really funny though, to think of me burying myself in a little one horse town. Why, I couldn't give up the city, as much as I'd like any man."

"But, Betty," he said, "I'm not—"

"Forget it, Ted," she interrupted. "I've got ideas of my own about marriage. Love is all right in a way, but money means more, and the man I marry must have oodles of it. I want to travel. England, France, the Orient. I want to see everything, and that takes a lot of money.

Poor guy, I guess she made him feel silly all right. He didn't say any more about it. Guess he was glad when the evening was over so he could pack up and be on his way back to Chico Creek.

Betty Lou, she went back to the race tracks. If one closed, she went to another. It didn't make any difference where they were runnin'. So long as there was long shots on the card, she'd be there.

She's sittin' home one night with nothin' to do but read the news, when pretty soon she jumps up quick with "Well, can you beat this? A cinch long shot right in my hands and I let it get away!"

I take a look at the paper that night an' starin' me right in the face is a picture of Ted Ainsley and a girl. Under the picture it says:

Theodore Mathew Ainsley, Millionaire Rug Manufacturer of Chico Creek, Calif., and His Bride, the Former Elaine Truesdale, Leave for Their Honeymoon on the Ainsley Yacht. They will make An Extensive Tour of Europe, Etc., Etc.

Just another long shot with a short price on 'im. It happens lots o' times on the track.

the quality of the eggs between the time they leave the laying house and upon reaching the market. At present the hens are producing eight cases of eggs each week which are shipped to the Pacific Co-operative Poultry Producers.

The flock averages 55 percent egg production throughout the year, and the cost of placing a pullet in the laying house is estimated at fifty cents, based upon the cost of feed, investment in plant and price received from sale of cockerels, not including labor.

Mr. and Mrs. Jackson are considered among the thrifty, systematic farmers on the project, and take an interest in all project activities.
