FIELD DAY SET JUNE 25 AT PENDLETON STATION.

PENDLETON—The annual field day at the Pendleton branch experiment station is scheduled for Thursday afternoon, June 25, announces G. A. Mitchell, superintendent. Mitchell, together with D. E. Stephens, superintendent of the Moro station, and possibly other staff members of the state college, will be at the station that day to explain to farmers the results of the research being carried on. Visitors will be able to view the results of varietal trials with wheat and other grains and the progress of the search for more smut-resistant, high-yielding sorts. The station will be at its best at that time just before harvest, and those in charge are preparing much of interest for those who attend. Particular stress will be placed this year on methods of preventing soil erosion and on practices which will meet the requirements of the new agricultural conservation program.

FOOD FREEZING EXPLAINED IN NEW COLLEGE BULLETIN.

Freezing affords one of the simplest methods of preserving foods, and with the rapid expansion of cold storage facilities available to the public, much interest has developed in methods of processing berries, vegetables and fruits for this purpose. To answer this demand a new station circular, No. 116, "Preserving of Fruits and Vegetables by Freezing," written by Ernest H. Wiegand, in charge of horticultural products work at Oregon State college, has just been published. This is a popular circular designed for the use of those interested in home use of freezing methods. It is written in easily understandable language and is made brief for easy reference purposes.

Those who have storage facilities kept at 10 degrees above zero or lower have a wide range of possibilities in the way of preservation by freezing. Storage up to 15 degrees above may be used, although it requires 10 degrees or lower for an initial freezing to obtain best results.

Under general methods of preparation, Professor Wiegand points out that containers for storage may be either glass, paraffined paper cups or even tin cans if the cans are "enameled." For vegetables, parchment lined wax boxes are also used. Vegetables are usually blanched before freezing, making possible a more brilliant color of the product and a halting of fermentation reactions.

The use of sugar and salt, how to fill containers to avoid breaking or bulging, how to pack vegetables for freezing, and hints on cooking frozen products are included. Specific directions are given for handling the many kinds of berries, cherries, apricots, figs, grapes, peaches and prunes.

The specific directions for strawberries say that the fruit should be picked when well colored and ripe but not soft. The berries are capped and washed and packed in containers at the rate of three pounds of berries to one pound of sugar, or in a syrup of 60 per cent density, made by using six pounds of sugar to four pounds of water. Usually the syrup pack looks best, says Wiegand, although the dry pack has possibilities.

Directions for freezing asparagus, beans, broccoli, cauliflower, sweet corn, mushrooms, peas and spinach are included.
