FORCED MOULTING NO GOOD FOR OREGON LAYING HENS

Attempts to improve on nature's season for laying hens to renew their feathers in preparation for the following winter have not proved profitable under Oregon conditions, according to a brief bulletin by Frank L. Knowlton, poultry husbandman at Oregon State college, just off the press.

The bulletin reports on the results of experiments conducted during two seasons with forced molting of White Leghorn hens. Several other states have conducted the tests with conflicting results, giving rise to requests on the part of Oregon poultrymen to find out how the plan would work under western conditions.

Knowlton concluded from his tests that forced molting, which is accomplished by a radical variation in diet and environmental factors, cannot be recommended as a dependable method of increasing the income from egg production. The theory is that by forcing early molting while large eggs are low in price, a profitable production of higher priced fall eggs can be induced. It was found, however, that the mortality of force molted birds was high and that severe culling was necessary in order to keep flock production above 50 per cent.
