Spuds Respond to Irrigation.

OREGON CITY—What is believed to be the largest yield of potatoes in Clackamas county for the 1937 season was obtained by Walter, Herman and Will Staehely, who pump 85 feet from Beaver Creek to irrigate their spuds. On land receiving water they raised 395 sacks of potatoes to the acre, as compared with only 159 sacks on non-irrigated land, reports J. J. Inskip, who Inskeep, who helped to measure off the plots and grade and weigh the potatoes. The Staehelys also irrigate 25 acres of ladino clover which makes pasture and some hay for 60 head of Guernsey cows.

Landplaster Boosts Pea Yield.

REDMOND—Application of 100 pounds of landplaster per acre to Austrian winter field peas brought about an increase of three bushels of peas per acre on the fertilized plot over the unfertilized portion on the farm of Vern Skelton in the Cloverdale community, he reported to County Agent G. Y. Hagglund. The increase in vegetative growth was readily apparent throughout the growing season, he said.

Sheep Show Grass Preferences.

ROSEBURG—Sheep showed a definite preference for meadow or tall fescue, meadow foxtail, reed canary and tall oat grasses when turned in to graze on the grass nursery established on the farm of C. D. Glenn at Glide, reports J. Roland Parker, county agent. The bent grasses and red top were too far advanced at the time to be palatable, he says, and the perennial rye grass and orchard grass showed but light grazing.
