WHEN THE HIGH LINE COMES

By Frank J. G. Duck, Secretary Rural Electrification Bureau.

PART II

Don't let the electrical contractor convince you that he can save you money by skimping on the wiring job. If he recommends undersized wires, too few circuits or too small a number of outlets, don't employ him at any price. For he is not working in either your or his own interest, and if you listen to him you will be handicapped every time you want to use electricity.

Tell your contractor that, when it is finished, you are going to have his work inspected to make certain that it conforms to the requirements of the National Electrical Code, and any other standards that should be met. This can be arranged through the electrical inspector in your nearest community or through the utility company which will supply you with current. It is a most important check on the quality of workmanship and a safeguard against a poor, inadequate and unsafe wiring job. Don't forget it!

It's as simple as that, you say—all I've got to do is tell a good electrical contractor I want my farm wired, let him go ahead and then have the job inspected before making final payment. Not quite. There are certain things you must know so that you can carefully estimate your needs, present and future, and give him that information in detail. So let's discuss the various phases of adequate wiring. First, the service installation and distribution.

Electricity for your farm is usually supplied by what is known as 230-115 volt, single-phase, three wire service. Lights, small appliances and motors not larger than 1-3 horsepower operate at 115 volts. Ranges, water heaters and larger motors require 230 volts. However, the current in the transmission or high line is at a much higher voltage, usually 6600 or 13,200 volts. Therefore, it must be reduced or "transformed" before you can use it. The bringing of electrical service from the power line to your farm, and its subsequent distribution to the home and various buildings, is known as the service entrance or installation. If located within about 150 feet of the transmission line, service probably will be established by placing a transformer in the line and running a 230-volt three-wire system to your farmstead. If more remote, it will be necessary to extend the transmission line to your farm and locate the transformer at a central point near your home and buildings.

There are two general systems of bringing electricity to your home and buildings. The one most frequently employed consists in running the service wires to a central pole on which is a meter to measure the amount of current you use. From there, individual lines or circuits radiate to the entrance points of your house, barn, granary, tool shed and other buildings. In the other system, the service wires are brought directly to your house or some building in which a meter is located and the various lines or circuits extended from that point. If the wires from the central distributing pole in your yard are overhead, they should be high enough to avoid any chance of striking them when driving wagons or other equipment through the yard. Though more expensive, it is more advantageous in some respects to have all distribution wires laid underground. Depending upon the tasks to be done by electricity, adequate, efficient and safe service requires several branch circuits. At least one 15-ampere circuit should be provided for each 500 square feet of floor area computed from the outside dimensions of your house—not including open porches and unfinished parts of the attic and basement. At least one appliance branch circuit should be installed to supply all room, kitchen and pantry, and another for such service in the laundry. Individual circuits should be provided for the range, water heater, bathroom heater, oil burner, stoker, laundry hot plate and all other fixed appliances rated at 1,000 watts and over.

A main switch, controlling all circuits to the other buildings, should be located in your home. However, separate control switches in each building also are desirable. As you may know, fuses and circuit breakers are safety devices which, in the event of an overload, open the circuit and thus prevent fires and other serious troubles. It is most important that these, as well as your wires and switches, be of the correct capacity to protect your installation and also permit you to make full use of all your electrical equipment. (Part III of this series will appear in an early issue.)

Poultry Club Being Organized.

A 4-H poultry club, which will probably become project wide, is being organized and anyone interested in becoming a member should get in touch with Jay T. Pierson, assistant county agent.

BOWEN TO PRESENT CO-OP CASE BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE

(Co-op League News Service)

NEW YORK—E. R. Bowen, general secretary of the Cooperative League of the U.S.A., has been asked to appear before the Senate Committee on Unemployment and Relief in Washington, Monday, March 14, to submit evidence as to the effect of cooperatives in stabilizing industry and agriculture. The Senate committee has been hearing reports from business, professional and civic leaders during the last six weeks.

Reports from consumer cooperative retail and wholesale societies in the U. S. show that the volume of business of cooperatives rose more than 20 per cent last year; that in most instances more workers were employed at the close of 1937 than at the end of 1936; and that there were no failures of retail cooperatives served by the major cooperative wholesalers in the United States. There are today approximately 7,000 consumers cooperative societies in this country with 2,000,000 members and an annual business of half a billion dollars yearly.

WAGE EARNERS HEALTH ASSN. REPORTS WIDE SERVICES

ST. LOUIS—In spite of constant attacks by the officials of organized medicine in St. Louis, the Wage Earners Health Association showed important progress during the past year. Its 1936-1937 report reveals that an average of 1.86 calls per month were made to its medical department by each of its members; 40 per cent of the office visits were credited to specialist departments; more than one-half of the calls were made for preventive services; physical examinations were given periodically to all members and Kahn tests for syphilis were routinely given.

In a recent criticism of the cooperative health association, the editors of the Bulletin of the St. Louis Medical Society wrote, "The activities of this organization should impress upon the society the necessity for the adoption of a prepayment plan for medical care," but, they added, a plan "by and under the control of the Society." Admitting that the pre-payment plan for medical services is "essential, vital and imperative," they did not approve of a group not under the Medical Society jurisdiction. All the doctors serving the association are members in good standing of the medical society. The control of the Health Association, however, rests with the consumer members.

CO-OP REPORTS HALF MILLION DOLLAR SALES IN TOWN OF 7,000.

(Co-op League News Service)
Maynard, Mass.—The United Cooperative Society of Maynard, now well established as the biggest retail business in this town of 7,000 inhabitants, recorded the biggest business in its history when its total sales for 1937 mounted to more than half a million dollars.

Charles W. Manty, president of the co-op, reported to the 275 members and visitors gathered for the co-op's annual meeting here February 21, that sales totaled $509,190 in 1937 as against $475,931 during the previous year. Net earnings for the year were $20,598 of which approximately $17,000 will be paid out in 3 1/2% savings returns.
