BETTER WATER SYSTEMS ON FARM

A definite campaign in selected Oregon counties to assist farmers in obtaining better water supplies for the farm homes is announced by the Oregon State college extension service.

Everett Davis, extension specialist in agricultural engineering, will devote most of the summer months to this project. Extensive work will be carried on in Columbia and Wasco counties, with some follow-up work in Jackson county and probably some in Josephine.

Recent reports of home betterment committees in the county outlook conferences indicated that the strongest desire on the part of homemakers for improved facilities is for running water in the houses. Davis will conduct demonstrations of successful rural home water systems and will hold community meetings with county extension agents for those interested in making such improvements. He will also cooperate with local dealers in encouraging displays of water system equipment.

"Water system improvement may range all the way from installing a pitcher pump in the kitchen, connected with a shallow well or cistern, to the development of community gravity water systems to bring water from mountain streams," says Davis.

Plans for such gravity systems are being made at present in Columbia county where he plans his first campaign. Farmers living on diked land along the Columbia river are having difficulty with water supplies, and are planning to form water associations to pipe supplies from the hills.

HORSES AND MULES STILL LEAD VALUES

Evidently horses and mules are far from being outmoded in Oregon or the United States as a whole, according to latest government figures obtained by the animal husbandry department at Oregon State college.

On January of this year Oregon had 155,000 horses valued at $13,125,000, and 8000 mules valued at $730,000. The combined value is five times as much as is invested in swine in Oregon and almost equal to the value of Oregon sheep. In the country as a whole the aggregate value of horses and mules is $1,562,081,000, which exceeds the amount invested in any other class of livestock. The value of all dairy cattle is $206,000,000 below that of horses and mules.

WHEN THE HIGH LINE COMES

By Frank J. G. Duck, Secretary Rural Electrification Bureau.

PART IV

Now that you have a general knowledge of what comprises adequate wiring, know the need therefor and are familiar with the principles of good lighting, let's consider in some detail the lighting and wiring requirements of each room in your home.

We will assume that you live in a typical six-room house with an attic and a completely excavated basement. If your home is larger or smaller than this, your electrical needs will be modified accordingly.

First to be considered are the porches—front, rear and, occasionally, side. The main light outlet should be installed at the ceiling if the porch is roofed or, if open, as a bracket lamp which will light the faces of those wishing admittance. Although both types of fixtures sometimes are used on roofed porches, as a general rule the ceiling outlet alone is sufficient. Each should be controlled by a wall switch just inside the door. A weather-proof duplex convenience outlet also should be provided, especially where a roofed porch is partly or totally inclosed and used for entertainment.

Clothes closets, regardless of their location, which have a floor area of ten square feet or more should have an interior ceiling light or bracket outlet located above the door. Either type can be operated by a wall or automatic door switch, or pull chain.

The entrance foyer requires a ceiling outlet operated by a pull chain or by a wall switch located inside the door to the hall. It usually is possible to locate the ceiling light in the main hall so that the steps to the second floor will be illumined from top to bottom. This light should be controlled by three-way switches at the bottom and top of the stairs.

If decorative wall or table lamps are desired in the hall or entrance foyer, they can be connected to convenience outlets—at least one of which should be provided in the second-floor hall if it is unusually long. If small, a wall light will be sufficient.

General illumination of the living room most frequently is obtained from a central ceiling outlet operated by a wall switch located at the entrance from the hall. It also often is desirable to install decorative bracket and mantle lights, about six feet from the floor, and control them by a wall switch preferably located near the entrance to the dining room.

Among the electrical appliances that you will want to use in the living room, in addition to floor and table lamps, are a radio, electric clock and vacuum cleaner. Be certain that they are taken into consideration so that the number and location of convenience outlets will be such as to avoid the need for long and, therefore, unsightly and often dangerous cords.

In the dining room, general illumination also should be provided by a center light operated by three-way wall switches near the doors to the living room and kitchen. Side wall or bracket lights, often desired for decorative purposes, should be controlled by a separate wall switch located near the entrance from the living room.

It is advisable to install a convenience outlet in each part of the dining room where you may wish to place the buffet or serving table. These will permit ready use of such appliances as a percolator, toaster, waffle iron and grill. Floor outlets should not be used here or in any other room as they collect dirt and are easily broken.

On the farm, more than any other place, the kitchen is truly the "work shop" of the home. Therefore, good lighting is imperative. It is best to install a plain, efficient central ceiling outlet and use a 100, 150 or 220-watt lamp, the size depending upon the floor area and the color of the walls and ceiling. This light should be operated by three-way switches located at the doors to the dining room and rear entrance. Usually, a pull-chain bracket lamp over the sink or side working table also is desirable. The best rule to follow is to so arrange the lighting of this room that you never will have to work in a shadow.

A sufficient number of convenience outlets should be installed in the kitchen, about three feet from the floor, so that you easily can use all your electrical appliances. At least one appliance branch circuit should be provided to supply the convenience outlets both there and in the dining room. A separate three-wire branch circuit is required for an electric range. Outlets should be placed near the sink and table or working space, and others provided for the refrigerator and clock.

If you have a pantry, a central ceiling outlet with pull chain will give sufficient light. At least one duplex convenience outlet should be provided for the refrigerator if it is placed there instead of in the kitchen.
