be furnished by the state college and of their planting and care. There will be a question period after the talk.

Why not keep a condensed garden diary this year? Mark the first blooms in the spring, dates of subsequent plantings, spraying for pests, and things to remember for next year.

Who is going to be the first to try an espalier fruit tree?

There is a movement about town to remove old poplars that have served well as windbreaks, but have grown old and shapeless, and in many instances dangerous. They are being replaced by younger and sturdier trees.

The February issue of American Home has a fine article on roses by a Portland writer. It is well worth reading.

The ideal garden for the average person is one that will look attractive without demanding too much care. There are ways of avoiding needless work and of getting results without being a slave to the job.

The woman who must always be spraying, weeding, watering and transplanting, and who has no time to just sit and look at the garden is stressing the working side of gardening too much.

The first and main point, of course, is to have a well planned garden.

Flowers are a delight that the novice gardener cannot resist. However, if time is limited for upkeep, the number of flowers, particularly annuals in the garden, should be kept at a minimum. Get seasonal color from flowering shrubs or from perennials that do not require frequent transplanting and dividing. Grow some flowering vines.

Time in preparing the ground, in spraying and staking, will be less if the flowers are kept in limited areas. Put all the roses in beds by themselves. Collect the scattered perennials and make one fine bed rather than numerous patches of flowers here and there.

Put together plants that like the same conditions. Grow plants that like your particular situation. Plants that must be pampered have no place in the garden of the person who has little time to spend in upkeep.—Taken from Oregon Journal.
