NYA CAMP GIVES TRAINED FOREST FIRE DEPARTMENT

Those in charge of fighting forest fires in Oregon this summer will have available the services of what will roughly correspond to a city fire department adapted to forest fire purposes, announces E. G. Mason, assistant dean of forestry. This service is made possible through the organization and establishment at the Peavy aboretum, just north of Corvallis, of an NYA camp in which will be located all summer from 60 to 75 students in the school of forestry especially trained in fighting forest fires.

The men will be in charge of George T. Schroeder, assistant professor of forestry, who is considered the best qualified specialist in forest fire fighting in any forestry school in the United States.

Under the arrangements just completed NYA will pay the men $30 a month while they are in camp. From this the students will pay their own board. Camping facilities have been provided by the Oregon Forest Fire association, which is one of the sponsors of the project. The men will be on call at any time for fire fighting service in units of five men. Busses will be available to take them to fires throughout western Oregon and even in parts of eastern Oregon if desirable.

While on actual fire duty they will be used in certain work of a forestry nature in the McDonald experimental forest.

Besides affording opportunity for summer employment the plan provides the men with additional training for professional careers, says Dean Mason, while at the same time providing a nucleus of trained fire fighters for emergency call.

Sponsors of the project, in addition to the school of forestry here, are the state department of forestry, the Oregon Forest Fire association, the Pacific northwest forest experimental station, the United States forest service, and the O & C Land administration.
