POOLING of Power Systems means dependable electric service EVERYWHERE!

Note the tremendous increase in high-voltage transmission lines since the last war. Power plant capacity on these interconnected systems has increased 4% times. Today there is plenty of power everywhere!

★ Electric block signals . . . the "traffic lights" of the great railroad systems . . . speed millions of tons of national defense materials safely over the rails every minute of the day and night. These signals must not fail! Troops, munitions and supplies must move on schedule! That is why railroad managers are happy that their electric service comes from the vast interconnected grid of private power systems . . . instead of from small, isolated power plants serving but one city or county.

POWER GRID HELPS ALL INDUSTRY!

Supplying dependable electric service to railroad signals is but one example of the important part the power grid plays in national defense. All along the 42,000 miles of electrically controlled tracks new factories are springing up, established plants are working overtime on defense orders. These industries, whether large or small, are getting all the electric power they need, when they need it. The network of transmission lines can bring power from many different sources to supply the abnormal needs of any area.

WE HAVE 3 TIMES POWER OF AXIS!

Because private power systems have always built ahead of actual demand, there is plenty of reserve capacity for use in national defense. America today has four and one-half times the electric generating capacity it had in 1917 . . . or three times as much power as Germany and Italy combined.

PRIVATE CAPITAL BUILT 90%!

Private capital—and the American spirit of free enterprise—has built more than 90% of these extensive power facilities . . . without subsidy from the public treasury. Only 5% of the nation's power has been created by municipal systems, only 5% by the federal government.
