GENE LEAR URGES TO GROW TOMATOES

Production of tomatoes in Oregon victory gardens this year will have an important bearing on both good family living and the nation's wartime food production goals, points out Gene Lear, assistant county agent of Umatilla county.

The national goal for canned tomatoes in 1942 is set at 40 million cases, an all-time high mark. The state goal for number of farm gardens in Oregon is 59,500. If enough tomatoes were produced in each one of these farm gardens to permit the saving of only 10 cans which could otherwise be purchased from stores, a total of 24,400 cases would be added to the commercial stocks for war needs, says Mr. Lear.

This tomato situation serves as a striking example of how Oregon's victory gardens can contribute substantially to the stock of tomato and other supplies for home use fresh from the garden and for canning.

In preparing to grow tomatoes

this year, Mr. Lear suggests that for most areas the best varieties are Bonnie Best, John Baer, Prichard or Stokesdale. For a late tomato Rutgers is recommended. Plants can be grown or purchased to make one setting about May 15, and the second around June 10, these dates to be varied somewhat according to the altitude and frost record of the particular community.

These two plantings will ordinarily supply fresh tomatoes over a long season, provide tomatoes for canning, and also leave a few to be stored after fall frosts arrive. Tomatoes are particularly easy to can, are important nutritionally as a valuable source of vitamin C, and are suitable for use for all three meals in various forms.

Those who desire a specific planting plan for a home garden will find one diagrammed in detail in extension circular No. 283, available at county agents' offices. Extension bulletin No. 552 even gives the amount of seed needed for a given length of row. It is recommended that garden seeds be purchased early but only in amounts needed for this year's planting. Marking the date of purchase on the package is a good plan where not all the seed is used immediately.
