QUALITY IS BASIS OF SUCCESS WITH POTATO MARKETING

The ability of Oregon potato producers to deliver a quality product to consumers will determine whether they can continue to maintain a profitable market in the face of stiff competition from other areas. Such is the conclusion reached by Oregon State college research men who have just published the results of their study of the marketing of central Oregon and Klamath basin late crop potatoes.

In the foreword to this publication, issued as station bulletin No. 400, Dean William A. Schoenfeld, director of the experiment station, points out that this is one of the few studies undertaken by a public research agency in which the major objective was to study the quality of the agricultural product at the point where it reached the consumer.

In making the study, Dr. D. B. DeLoach, agricultural economist, and Gordon Sitton, research assistant, examined numerous samples collected from wholesale and retail outlets along the Pacific coast at various seasons of the year. They found that the principal causes for deterioration in quality were rough handling, causing broken and shattered potatoes, improper storage that caused dry rot and soft rot, and improper display in the retail stores, which resulted in greening from excessive light.

After studying the condition of the potatoes at various stages from the shipper to the consumer, the investigators made a number of recommendations as to how excessive deterioration can be reduced.

The fact that Oregon producers have been able to build up markets in an extremely competitive field is a tribute to the basic quality of their product and of their ability to produce at relatively low unit cost, the bulletin also points out.

One tangible result of the study already has been the change in state rulings to permit Oregon growers to ship their potatoes to terminal ports in used bags, as was permitted already in California, when the potatoes are to be repacked to meet the requirements of the army or navy. Copies of the 40-page bulletin may be had from county extension offices.

SUDDEN GROWTH OF HERMISTON IS SKETCHED

Portland—How Hermiston, normally a town of 800 inhabitants, mushroomed almost overnight into a young city of more than ten times that number of people during the year 1941, when a vast United States Army Ordnance Depot and Ammunition Dump was constructed there, is included in the historical sketch of Umatilla county which is a feature of the latest volume in the Inventory of the County Archives of Oregon series of books to make its appearance. Publication of the Umatilla county volume, No. 30 in the series, has just been announced by E. J. Griffith, WPA State Administrator.

Primarily, the new book, prepared by the Oregon Historical Records Survey, Division of Professional and Service Projects, WPA, is a complete listing and classification of all of the official records of Umatilla county and designed for the particular use of public officials and others interested in such records, which are arranged under the offices to which they belong. The book contains a summary of the housing, care and accessibility of the records; maps of boundary changes and land resource areas; a chapter on the governmental organization and record system; a chart of the county government; floor plans of the courthouse; a table of the abbreviations, symbols and explanatory notes used in the book; a selected bibliography; chronological and alphabetical indices; a list of similar inventories prepared by the Oregon Historical Records Survey.

The historical section of the new book is expected to prove of value to teachers, libraries and research students delving into Umatilla county history as it includes the region's historical and geographical background, natural setting, topography, geology, exploration, first settlements, Indian tribes and wars, gold mining, freighting, stage coaching, cattle ranching, wheat growing and other eras of development.

The new book will be distributed free to state and local officials, to public and school libraries and historical societies within the state, and to a number of important libraries and agencies outside of Oregon.

SPRING CROPS TO BE INCREASED TO MEET WAR DEMANDS

War conditions and various governmental actions are greatly affecting the outlook in 1942 for spring planted crops in Oregon, reports the Oregon agricultural extension service in the current review of production and market prospects. Among the spring crops of commercial importance in Oregon, governmental price support has been assured for corn, sugar beets, dry beans, dry field peas, canning peas, canning tomatoes, certain cover crop seeds and flax seed.

The report just issued also reviews the prospects for wheat, feed grains, hay, fiber flax, hops, potatoes, and miscellaneous vegetable crops. While most of these crops are included in increased production goals this year, wheat is expected to show a decrease of some 10 per cent in this state, according to the report. The carry-over of wheat in the nation on July 1, 1942, may be as much as 600 million bushels, even though it is now expected that the release of stored wheat for feed purposes will bring an increase in the use of wheat for feed of around 30 million bushels.

Data included in the report on price levels show that, while the general level of farm prices in Oregon has risen rapidly during the past year to a point about equal to that prevailing during the 1926-1930 period, it still is much below the first world war period of 1919.

Despite the fact that farm prices in the United States as a whole are one-half higher than during the 1910-14 period, the exchange value or purchasing power of farm products is now about at "parity." This is because the level of prices which farmers must pay for commodities, taxes, interest, and wages is also far above that of the 1910-14 period.

The report was prepared by L. R. Breithaupt, extension agricultural economist at O. S. C., from federal and state statistics. Copies are available from county agents or direct from the college.
