FEED-WHEAT PLAN WIDELY USED TO LIFT PRODUCTION

Sale of government-stored wheat for feeding purposes at prices materially below what feed wheat can usually be purchased for is having a pronounced effect on the increase in dairy products and other livestock output in Oregon. Reports from the western Oregon county agents show that in less than a month since the AAA made wheat available under this plan, 72 carloads had been ordered by producers or feed dealers in six counties west of the Cascades.

Cheaper feed wheat is making possible greater feeding of concentrates to dairy cows in accordance with feeding tests carried out by the Oregon experiment station. These tests showed that wheat could be used in dairy concentrates up to 50 per cent without loss of palatability, and up to 75 per cent without great difficulty. Hog growers are also making good use of the wheat, as tests by growers and the experiment station as well have shown that wheat is a better feed even than corn, pound for pound.

Largest orders have been placed in Lane county, where the Farmers Union is assisting in the distribution of producer pools for $1 per ton, using producers' own sacks. In Jackson and Josephine counties dealers are cooperating with the farmers in distributing the wheat. In Jackson county the cost to growers who furnish their own sacks is $34 per ton. In Douglas county growers have pooled orders for carload lots, with each car sent in the name of one grower, who is responsible for its disposal. In Curry county some feed wheat will be used as maintenance feed for sheep, while in Coos the greatest portion of it will go into dairy feed. Wheat is also being recommended for use in place of molasses, no longer available, in putting up grass silage. One hundred pounds of wheat for each ton of grass will serve the purpose.

"This increased wheat feeding to dairy cows will help provide the 11 per cent increase in milk production which Oregon has promised in the food-for-victory program," says W. L. Teutsch, assistant director of extension.
