"PP&L has stood for progress in our community for 35 years"

says John Vaughan, Superintendent, the Pendleton City Water Department

new development that has come along. It means a lot to this community to have such an up-and-coming organization out boosting for progress."

"You bet I remember when PP&L came to Pendleton! It was in 1910, the same year Vaughan Electric, my former electrical wiring and supply business, was established. In fact, PP&L and I were next-door neighbors then. That was also the first year of the famous Pendleton Round-Up.

"From the time we first had electricity in Pendleton until shortly before PP&L came here, we only had lighting service during the night-time hours. It was certainly an accomplishment when we got 'round-the-clock electric service.

"But that was only the beginning of many benefits to be followed up by PP&L during the 35 years it has been a citizen of Pendleton. Pacific Power & Light Company immediately started to build up the territory by extending its electric lines to Reith, Helix, Pilot Rock, and other communities surrounding Pendleton.

"As a matter of fact, PP&L has lent a helping hand to just about every worth-while John Vaughan came to Umatilla County with his parents, Clark County, Washington, pioneers, in 1883. The family's first home in Pendleton is still standing. Mr. Vaughan's first job was fireman at the steam generating plant of the Pendleton Electric Light & Power Company, source of the city's first electric service, where he later became an operator. He was also driver for Pendleton's early-day, horse-drawn fire equipment.

Mr. Vaughan estimates that his firm probably wired 75% of the buildings in Pendleton from 1910 to 1937, and as PP&L built lines into the surrounding country, he also did wiring jobs there. He wired Pendleton's first electrically-operated grain elevator (now Collins Flour Mill) about five or six years after PP&L came to Pendleton. Since 1937, when he sold his interests in Vaughan Electric, he has been Pendleton City Water Superintendent. The business he established still operates under its original name.

One of the first electric ranges in Pendleton was installed in the Vaughan home. Today they have an all-electric home with range, water heater, refrigerator and all the small appliances. PP&L's continued rate reductions have made it possible for them to add new electric appliances year after year, without increasing their electric bill.
