As the Days Go By—

If a house burns down, that is just one very needed house less. During these days of emergencies, that is more important than usual. You may rest assured that you have insurance, but to rebuild is another problem. Therefore it would be wise for all home occupants to be more than usually careful about fire risks. These rushing days through which we are living leads to carelessness, and carelessness can become a crime against the great fight we are making to win the war. Hermiston has, so far, been fortunate in no losses from fires, but Winter is coming on when more fuel will be burned and dangers are increased. All flues should be checked over, debris about the premises should be cleared away, and constant daily care should be taken inside and outside to prevent fire danger. A house is a house in big letters now, and if yours burns you are just out in the cold, or go 100 miles to find another home.

Evidence of the progress of war is the notable relaxation of moral fiber, as shown by the increase of petty crimes. Last year, with twice the number of workers here, the violations of law was less than half we have had this season. Drunken and reckless driving, violations of the laws of speed, and all the other 60 traffic violations are more common. Petty thievery, brawls, domestic troubles, delinquencies of minors, rubber checks, defrauding linemen, and all the difficulties of the human family are more frequent. Officers are busier and courts more severe in their penalties in their efforts to preserve order, and enforce better conduct and compel a better observance of law. Men who should know better and on whom law observance should depend are often caught in the toils, and good citizenship often lends sympathy and aid to those who break the laws.

Let us all take heed.

War Also Brings Livestock Diseases

U. S. Veterinarians Mobilize for Action

(Special to Western Newspaper Union.) Will American farmers, in this war, be able to keep down the livestock plagues which have cut so seriously into the nation's food production in some of our former wars? Will we be able to deliver the millions of tons of food needed to help win the war for ourselves and our allies?

These questions are causing serious concern to farm and livestock leaders this spring, and definite steps are already being taken to throw every possible safeguard around the nation's livestock production machinery during this critical 1942.

One of the most important steps in this direction is being taken this month with the mobilizing of the entire veterinary profession from coast to coast, under preparedness committees named by the various state veterinary medical associations.

Another step is the inspection service now being maintained at all important ports of entry into the United States. Every animal brought in from a foreign country is given a thorough examination by government veterinarians to make sure that foreign livestock plagues are not brought in to threaten our home herds.

Civil War Epidemic.

That serious outbreaks of livestock disease could wreck certain phases of our food producing effort is evidenced by the history of some of America's former wars. During the Civil war, for example, our cattle population was virtually wiped out in some sections by Texas fever. Cattle in other areas were devastated by outbreaks of pleuropneumonia. Large sections of the swine belt experienced severe outbreaks of hog cholera. As a result, meat supplies for our armies were strictly limited, and "hard tack and sow belly" became a by-word among soldiers of the Civil war.

With livestock disease controls broken down, Europe's great food producing regions are being swept today by severe outbreaks, which are adding their share to starvation conditions in the war-torn regions.

"America is the most healthful country in the world for livestock and we intend to keep it so despite the stress of war conditions," Dr. H. W. Jakeman, president of the American Veterinary Medical Association, said this week in reporting upon the wartime program of the veterinary profession.

Steps by which farmers can cooperate in the campaign against preventable livestock disease include:

Raising pigs on clean ground, to avoid infection by disease germs lurking in old hog lots.

Calfhood vaccination to prevent Bang's disease losses. Inspection, aggregation, and treatment of dairy cattle for mastitis.

Immunization of horses against encephalomyelitis before the insect and mosquito season.

Isolation of newly purchased livestock from the home herd for a safe period to avoid spreading diseases.

Prompt diagnosis by a qualified veterinarian at the first signs of livestock illness.

Ready and Able

Agriculture today is in many ways better organized to meet the increased production of farm products which we need to feed our armies and those of the United Nations. Yet care should be exercised to see that soil resources are not depleted for the sake of possible temporary gains. Also that the fertility resources of the soil are not wasted.

Avoid plowing land with slopes of 25 per cent or better; practice contour or strip cropping; plant cover crops for soil protection; these are just a few of the practices suggested. Farmers could do well to consult their county agricultural agents for help on preventing erosion and the depletion of soil elements.

Alfalfa breeders are "going to town"—literally—with some of the promising new strains that yield well and are resistant to disease and weather injury. This is because a vacant lot in a town is likely to be the best place available to increase small quantities of seed with reasonable assurance of protecting it from contamination by unimproved alfalfas that will effect the new strains.
