The Willkie Personality

The main subject of national importance just now is Wendell Willkie's report to the American public and its reverberations. In a plain, clear, direct statement he has told what he heard and saw in his round the world trip to our allied nations. What criticism he made of war strategy and national policies were constructive, and with patriotic intent toward winning the war, both in a military way and as to gaining the proper place for this country in the making of a permanent peace.

It is to be expected in a country of free speech like ours that he will be both praised and criticised, but the fact is that his report will not be ignored, either in this country or in England and the rest of the fighting world. It is certain to stir action and cause changes. No one can deny that such an outstanding personality, who uses plain, and even blunt language, such practical philosophy, such economic grasp of international affairs, and such knowledge of the ideologies of the world's peoples, will have an effect on our thinking, now and into the future.

He has made plain that the world is for freedom—that thought is astir in all nationalities, except perhaps those whose expressions are controlled by dictators. And they all look to America to take the lead for them in the control of their own political and economic affairs, under a democratic form of government. For 150 years the United States has led the way to self government, and its efforts have spread this doctrine around the globe. We have become a great spiritual uplift to many down trodden nations, and our responsibility has become global. The days of empire control, or using Willkie's phrase, the "big house on the hill surrounded by mud huts", are over. We find ourselves in the great position, not only of fighting to maintain our own freedom, but fighting to help establish the freedom of the entire globe—a new world.

This is the conception of our duties that Willkie is seeking to impress on us in the conduct of the war, patriotically and economically. His may be a new voice of leadership from the wilderness, in which we yet find ourselves, in the spiritual uplift of mankind.

YOUR ELECTRIC SERVANT

★ In the famous Pendleton Woolen Mills a penny's worth of electricity operates a giant loom while it weaves a complete Navy blanket. This is just one example of Pacific Power & Light Company's war work. In shipyards, on 12,500 farms, and in scores of war factories PP&L electricity is speeding production... at amazingly low cost.

Business management started in years ago to make electric service widespread and cheap. Pacific Power & Light has extended its lines and reduced its rates again and again... until now electricity is today's biggest bargain... in war work as well as in your home.
