PRODUCTION ON FARM FOR 1943 TO BE HIKED UP

Production goals to help every Oregon farmer measure the best contribution his farm can make to the war effort in 1943 will be established in early December, R. B. Taylor, chairman of the state USDA war board, has announced.

State goals will be announced shortly after a regional meeting with Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard in Denver, November 30. County war boards, farmers, and farm leaders will then determine the maximum contributions that can be made in each county, and these goals will then be distributed to each farm through the 1943 farm plan of the AAA program.

The new goals, the chairman said, will probably look big. But the 1942 goals looked big too, he added, and they were surpassed, with an all-time record production achieved by farmers despite handicaps. Shortages of labor, machinery, transportation, and processing facilities will be serious threats to production which every agricultural agency will be helping farmers to overcome. Some definite steps in this direction have already been taken.

Taylor reported that larger goals than this year's record production can be expected for livestock, dairy and poultry products. Total crop acreage goals will be about the same as 1942, but shifts among individual crops will be asked.

Military and lend-lease needs together will demand half again as much food as in 1942—about one-fifth of the total food production, the war board chairman has been informed. Needs of the armed forces and the allies will take more than a quarter of the meat, a third of the lard, nearly a third of the eggs and half of the canned vegetables produced in America.

Taylor called attention to goals that have already been announced. These include at least a 10 per cent increase in pork production, a 50 per cent expansion in annual rye grass and hairy vetch cover crop seeds, and 200,000,000 extra winter chickens for meat. Oregon's share of this meat chicken goal, based on percentage of total poultry, would be about two million chickens.

TURKEY GREASE VITAL TO WAR

Housewives were asked today by Claude I. Sersanous, chairman of the state general salvage committee, to help put the skids under the Axis by saving the grease from their Thanksgiving turkey for the manufacture of ammunition.

"Turkey grease and all other waste fats are needed to make glycerine, an essential ingredient in explosives and gunpowder," Mr. Sersanous said. "One to two billion pounds of these waste fats are thrown away each year; every pound of it can be used in America's munitions factories."

"We must reach a rate yielding 30,000,000 pounds of glycerine from kitchen fats annually to offset possible shortages. Save pan drippings, plus cooked and uncooked fats after you have obtained all the cooking good from them. Strain the grease into a clean metal container, and when you have a pound or more, sell it to your butcher."

"You will help our soldiers on the fighting front if you see that your kitchen waste is used to lay waste the enemy."

Potato Breeders Make Test Plantings

Disease-Free Potatoes Only Control of Ring Rot

How new knowledge of plant science can lift some of the load from the mind of a worried farmer is illustrated by results of test plantings reported by potato breeders of the U. S. department of agriculture.

Ring rot is a serious potato disease. It appeared in Canada in 1931, in Maine in 1932, and spread rapidly causing serious crop losses. The only effective control is to plant nothing but disease-free seed potatoes. Traces of the disease in seed stock are difficult to detect and may lead to serious losses. Ring rot has been reported from 37 states.

If scientific knowledge had not advanced in the last 100 years, says Dr. R. M. Saltz, chief of the bureau of plant industry, the potato industry and the country generally might well worry over the possibility of a potato famine such as Ireland had in the Hungry Forties.

Potato specialists do not know of a gold commercial variety that will grow in spite of ring rot. But authors of the article report a trial of

"Come on out, guys and gals, see what's cookin'," says this newly hatched chick waiting for pals.

54 varieties artificially inoculated to insure a thorough test. Nearly all were severely diseased, but a precious few came through uninjured.

Various Spuds Tested.

These include two imported varieties "not commercially promising" and several seedlings. Half the hybrids of the cross between "President"—imported from England—and the valuable American variety, Katahdin, showed no infection. Several other seedlings showed signs of resistance.

These tests indicate that resistance to ring rot can be inherited by the potato. The "President" variety is not commercially valuable, but from a breeding standpoint it looks to be almost priceless. Based on these tests and their experience it should not be very difficult to produce varieties resistant to ring rot with good commercial qualities.

Alfalfa

Although alfalfa is a fairly recent arrival in the fields of the United States and Canada, it is one of the oldest crops known to man and flourished in Asia and Europe for centuries. For the last 20 years, our farmers have given it great preference and the acreage has nearly doubled.

Being especially rich in vitamins, it seems to offer good possibilities for industrial uses. A pilot plant is soon to be set up to extract pigments from dried alfalfa leaves. These will be used in coloring soaps and foods and in preparing medicines.

Some experiments also have been made in extracting alfalfa juice for human consumption so it may sometime appear on our breakfast tables. At Michigan State college, scientists have been working on the problem on making plastics out of alfalfa in the same way that soybeans are utilized.

At present, the chief industrial product is alfalfa meal which is merely hay ground into coarse particles which can be fed to animals without loss, and can be shipped more cheaply than baled hay. It can be used in mixed feeds for such small animals as rabbits and poultry.

Some of the meal in refined form has been used in breakfast foods for humans and experiments have been made to add carotene extraction to tonics and candy.

Rural Briefs

Fruit should be fully grown, well colored, but not overripe for good storage.

Production of crimson clover seed this year is expected to be about twice as large as the previous crop record of 1941.

By taking good care of eggs on the farm, especially during the summer months, poultrymen will get better returns for their product.
