NEW ELECTRICAL CONNECTIONS TO FARMS ALLOWED

Revised WPB regulations will make it possible for many Oregon farms to have the use of electricity to assist in livestock, dairy and poultry production, the state U.S.D.A. war board has announced.

The new regulations provide for electric service connections to farms needing power to operate production equipment and whose 1943 livestock and poultry production will total at least 10 animal units.

Applications to power companies or REA va-ops for new connections must be accompanied by certification from the county USDA war board that the connection will result in an increase in farm production or a saving in farm labor.

The length of new connections may be as much as 100 feet per animal unit, but may not exceed 5000 feet. A milk cow is rated as one animal unit. Equivalents include 10 head of cattle other than milk cows or feeders, 30 breeding ewes, 3 brood sows, 75 laying hens, 40 turkeys or geese, 20 cattle in feed lot, 160 lambs in feed lot, 30 feeder pigs, 600 broiler chickens or 250 chickens raised other than broilers.

The WPB order specifies that the applicant for a connection must have on hand or be able to get without priorities one of the following types of electric equipment: Water pump for livestock, milking machine, feed grinder, milk cooler, incubator, brooder, or feed grinder.

Farmers who believe they can qualify for a connection under the revised regulations are advised to consult their local power company, REA co-op, or the county war board.
