ORDNANCE WORK PLAYS VITAL PART IN WAR

Ben Franklin once said that for want of a nail, a shoe, a horse and a rider were lost. For want of a spare part, a gun, a man and a battle might be lost.

But not in this war, by American troops.

Colonel W. J. Hoffmann, commanding Umatilla Ordnance Depot, stated today that the Ordnance Department, Army Service Forces is making certain that every combat unit in every global theatre of war not only has plenty of guns but ample part replacements for those guns.

The magnitude of this task may be gauged from the fact that Army Ordnance provides our troops with some 1,700 fighting tools, made up of over 500,000 component parts.

Its importance becomes equally apparent when it is known that if one spare part for the recoil mechanism of a 90-mm. gun is not available, the whole gun is out of action. The spare part may weigh but a few ounces and could be carried in a vest pocket.

All guns receive severe field tests in this country before they are shipped overseas. But parts of guns inevitably become broken, worn, or otherwise unserviceable. Guns are damaged by enemy ground or air attacks. Where, when, why and how frequently will a gun fail to function? Army Ordnance must know with reasonable certitude.

This is the way the Ordnance Department deals with this vast and complex problem.

Spare parts are procured for 100 weapons at a time. This means that for every 100 Grand rifles there are supplied at least 8 rear sight apertures, 20 barrels, 20 extractors, 8 bolt assemblies, 16 stock assemblies and 12 trigger assemblies.

For a new weapon, like the Garand, the procurement of spare parts was estimated on the basis of past general experience with a similar weapon. These lists were then checked against battle area reports from the using services. Procurement lists are constantly being revised up or down, based on battle experience.

Manufacturers today must supply spare parts with every 500 small arms weapons. This involves a lot of unglamorous work for which companies and arsenals do not receive sufficient credit.

When emergency calls are received from the front lines to repair a 90-mm. gun. Ordnance soldier-mechanics load up a truck with spare parts and tools and speed forward. If these repair crews are to function efficiently, Army Ordnance must make sure that the right parts are in the right place

Too many spare parts are just as bad as not enough. Excess replacements slow up troop movements.

Such things as rivets, screws, pins, nuts and bolts are constantly supplied by the million. In Tunisia the dry desert climate necessitated frequent replacement of moving gun parts. In the Solomons and on Attu rust is the great enemy.

"The Forgotten Foundation of Democracy."

To every generation its issue. Sometimes when the fog of events around us becomes too thick we may rise above the fog by going back along the path of history to points where we can see what other generations have had to face.

Today, the central issue of this generation so far as our American public life is concerned, is the question whether we shall use successfully the democratic framework of ideas and methods, built up through the labor of centuries for the solution of our problems, or shall be induced to cast it aside in a despairing appeal to some dictator to save us.

Sunday morning July fourth, I shall discuss these problems with you.
