CONVENIENCES IN POST-WAR WORLD TO BE NUMEROUS

Precipitrons that will prevent the tiniest particle of dust, soot, smoke or dirt from entering the households they guard, and home laundry equipment that does the family wash with the push of a button are but samples of new electrical conveniences that await users in the post-war world, according to D. B. Leonard, Pacific Power & Light Co. commercial manager, and chairman of that company's post-war planning committee, who has returned from Pittsburgh.

Though manufacturing facilities are devoted to war goods, and peacetime products are still in the blueprint stage, post-war development plans are now so complete that a five-fold national increase in the average home use of electricity has been predicted, he said.

Leonard was one of more than 200 representatives of the nation's major electric utility companies invited to attend a post-war power use forum conducted by the Westinghouse Manufacturing Co. in the Pennsylvania city.

New developments in lighting will deliver almost double the foot-candles of illumination that pre-war uses of electricity provided. Applications of electronics and dielectric heat hold more miracles for industrial production.

A lesser application of electronics will enable you to open your garage doors with push-button control from your approaching car.

A sterilamp will kill harmful bacteria in sickrooms, safeguard baby's bottle and increase the days that food may be held in the household refrigerator. A versatile ozone lamp will be equally adapted to handling factory fumes or ridding the kitchen of cooking odors. Floor lamps in your living room will utilize improved fluorescent lighting.

Most post-war homes will have complete automatic laundry equipment and an economical electric clothes dryer will dispel the inconvenience of rainy wash days.

Quantities of new household electrical equipment will become available five or six months after the close of the war, Leonard predicted. Manufacturers will first produce 1942 and what would have been 1943 models as they reconvert their factories to peacetime pursuits and turn to post-war blueprints.
