

Attention, Farmers!

The Farm Bureau Cooperative of Hermiston is your business. Through the foresight of a few pioneers of the Hermiston, Stanfield, Echo, Irrigon and Boardman districts, the organization was established, and since its inception it has supplied you with your needs in poultry and dairy feeds, field seeds, etc., at a saving which they believe you could not have attained elsewhere.

The business is yours, and is being operated through you by a board of directors. Your representatives believe that if you will check the formulas and prices of the feeds we have to offer, you will find that you can make a saving by patronizing

COOPERATIVE CANNERY

Down On Mac's Farm

The age at which an animal may become capable of physiological reproduction varies according to species and is modified by domestication. The advent of ovulation and spermatogenesis in horses and cattle has been profoundly modified by domestication through selection, feeding and housing. Instead of ovulation beginning at 24 to 27 months, as it does in wild or semi-wild heifers, in highly bred dairy heifers, estrus appears at 6 to 8 months, when they may not yet have attained one third their expected size. Hence the dairy heifer, if opportunity be offered, conceives long before she is able physiologically to produce young.

Dairymen largely breed their heifers at about 15 months of age so that they may be in milk at two years. There is ample room for conflict of opinion regarding the best age for the commencement of breeding dairy heifers. It is well known that dairy heifers, bred to calve first at two years, in addition to a high note of abortion, retained afterbirth and other pathological phenomena, have a short duration of pregnancy, and the calves are subnormal in size and vigor.

Some observant dairymen, while adhering to the custom of breeding at 15 months, to calve at two years, regularly discard these small, inferior firstlings because in their experience these poorly developed calves fail later as breeders.

Dr. Williams states, "My personal observations and all available data seem to indicate that a dairy cow lives longer, produces more and better calves, and therefore yields more lactation periods per unit of time, if bred to calve first at about three years."

The above information was submitted by R. R. Fast, local veterinarian, through the courtesy of the Hermiston Grain & Feed Co., the home of Umatilla brand feeds.

BOARDMAN NEWS

By Margaret Thorpe
