The Flood Tide of Politics on Public Shores

The full tide of American politics is soon to be lashing the shores of public opinion. The highest tide will be lashed against that undecided opinion, reckoned at about 20 per cent of the voters. Forty per cent on each side are strongly partisan, and whatever the arguments of the campaign will vote about that way. The voice of independents and the wavering will be heard to express itself as the campaign progresses.

This Thursday evening Governor Dewey opens his speaking campaign in Philadelphia, which will be important enough to set all the pros and cons talking. About September 15th, Congress will adjourn to allow the members to return home, and 1000 speech-makers will begin talking all phases of politics. State and county political candidates will all soon be in action throughout the nation, and radios will buzz with hot arguments and newspapers will have their usual say in reports, editorial opinions and columns of commentators.

One thing is certain, it will be a hot campaign. At present it appears that a hot campaign will be necessary to stir the lethargy of the average voter. He is just too busy with his own affairs, and the war consumes much of his time in interest, particularly now that it is nearing the end in Europe. The big problems before the statesmen do not reach down to the average mind. What will happen when Hitler cracks up is a matter of wait and see. And there will be much to happen. Transition of a large part of war industry to peace production, the movement of large forces of the armies home, and employment of both soldiers and war workers, restrictions on all business, financing of small businesses, holding down the strong tendency toward rank inflation, and the prevention of deflation, correction of the long period of adjustments from peace to war and from war back to peace, will all be subjects that we will hear much about during the next few weeks. Along with the effect of coming events and how the campaigners present the various subjects will determine the marking of the ballots on November 7th.
