Pfc. William J. Correa, paratrooper in Germany, was wounded a second time April 2 and is now in a French hospital, according to a telegram from the war department. A letter from him dated April 4 says when he landed in Germany March 24 he thought he would go all the way through, but they got his number April 2. He was hit about 4:00 a. m., was picked up an hour later and operated on that evening. Then he rode all night by train to a hospital in Belgium. The hospital was a long tent, fixed up fine with radio, books, cigarettes daily and fresh eggs, a welcome change from the powered variety. April 8 he was moved to another hospital in France. He expected to be out in three weeks, he said. German homes he saw were wonderfully equipped with every modern convenience, silverware, electric clocks, etc., but many are being blown up. He says he is not sorry for them as they brought this destruction on themselves. Carrea was reported missing in action in February but turned up later in a French hospital.
