

TROTTERS

But they weren't just fun gags aimed at kids. They also included children in their jokes. One time, in the second half, they stopped the game and brought out a little boy. They had him shoot, and when he couldn't score the basketball that was bigger than his head, they lifted him up so he could essentially dunk, then gave him a jersey.

Every gag involving a person ended with a gift. Sometimes it was a "sweaty" armband, sometimes it was a jersey. Either way, everyone who participated got something.

"The way they got the whole audience involved so often with so many things to do, I thought it was a really cool thing," Barzee said.

It's clear why the Globetrotters cater to young people. It's the majority of the audience. In the quaint Toyota Center, only a handful of fans didn't have a child or young person with them. Grandparents took their grandchildren. Parents came with their families. Kids anywhere from 2-years-old to 12-years-old to teenagers were there. Lines formed whenever there was time to buy the famous Globetrotters basketballs. After the game, an autograph session gave everybody an opportunity to walk away with a souvenir.

Caitlin Korause drove from Spokane with her family and, while holding a basketball to be signed, said her favorite part was Rocket Pennington climbing on the basket.

Harlem Globetrotter Hammer Harrison poses with a young fan on his shoulders while players and fans alike dance the "Y.M.C.A." between the third and fourth quarters at Sunday's performance in Kennewick.

Harlem Globetrotter Jet dances with a young fan during their rendition of "Y.M.C.A." during their performance in Kennewick Sunday afternoon.

Cheese Chisholm of the Harlem Globetrotters and the game's MC dance to Y.M.C.A. with some children on Sunday during the Globies' performance in Kennewick.

Catholic Church, sold group tickets to help the parish with their building fund. About 30 people formed the Hermiston group.

But the Globetrotters also know the impact they can have. During a timeout, Hawk Thomas stepped to half court and gave a speech about battling adversity and doing what you set your mind to. Thomas overcame serious barriers to become a Harlem Globetrotter, and, together with World Vision, a charity helping children around the world get the services and goods they need, they're trying to help the group that most enjoys their work. They understand most of the audience is going to be kids, and they consciously use their platform to try and help them as much as possible. On top of that, they try to make the kids' experience memorable, or as memorable as it can be for a toddler.

"Kids are awesome," Barzee said. "They get that look in their eye when they see something that they really like and something like this is pretty cool."

"It was funnier than I thought it would be," she said.

New Hermiston resident Mark Gemolski and organizer of Hermiston's trip to Kennewick — and part of the reason the Globetrotters visited this weekend at all — said he's certainly open to making it an annual event, depending on interest, of course. Barzee said they'd be willing to come again, as well. Gemolski, who is longtime friends with Eloise Saperstein, the daughter of Abe, the founder of the Globetrotters, and with Our Lady of Angels
