As it turns out, the recent expansion has resulted in even greater use. Registered on popular websites people use to search for places to play, the McNary course is catching the attention of disc golf enthusiasts, said Matt Richmond, president of the Umatilla Disc Golf Club.

"It's sort of like build it and they will come," he said.

The front nine features manicured grass with trees in a park-like setting. Also, the dam and Columbia River provides a picturesque backdrop. Most of the newer holes offer additional challenges with scrub brush, elevation changes and some wide-open fairways. Previously viewed as a beginner's course, Wilkinson and others said further development has added technical aspects when playing a round.

"The expansion has turned a beginner's course into a force to be reckoned with," said former Richland resident Donny Ballew.

Ballew, who now lives in Spokane, often returns to play in McNary. He said it provides a nice mixture of short placement shots with holes that allow players to crank out monster drives.

Disc golfers also appreciate the low-cost of participating in the sport. The McNary course, as well as most others, are free to play. After investing in discs and accessories, Wilkinson said the activity is fairly affordable.

"Sometimes I get overzealous about discs and I'll spend way too much on them," she said with a laugh. "The biggest expense is gas going to wherever to play."

Area clubs also host tournaments, which offer participants an opportunity to win money or equipment. And, more important, a chance to meet other disc golf addicts. Although it's a competitive game, Ballew said there's camaraderie among players.

"Win or lose, we all root for each other and share one bond — we love throwing plastic discs at metal chains," he said.
