The Hermiston Junior Academy will celebrate its 75th year by showing its students what school was like when they first opened their doors.

"We'll be going back to basics," said principal and teacher Jordan Lindsay. "We will try to tie our curriculum into 75 years of operation."

For the students in the school, open to kindergarten through eighth grade, that will include learning skills that used to be more common, but have fallen by the wayside in many schools.

"We'll be preserving food, woodworking — things that may have been taught 75 years ago," Lindsay said. Other lessons teachers are considering include learning how a camera from 75 years ago worked, and skills still applicable today — like quilting and gardening.

The school will try some new things, too, but the basic tenets of the Seventh-day Adventist education are comparable to those when the school started. The school teaches all its courses with a focus on the Bible, including creation-based science curriculum.

The school is small, with an average class size of 10 to 15 students. Classes are taught in groups of three grade levels: kindergarten through second, third through fifth, and sixth through eighth. There is also an on-site preschool for 3- and 4-year-olds.

While the teachers at the school, of which there are four, must be members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, it's open to all students. Some parents, Lindsay said, are drawn to the school's small size and low teacher-to-student ratio. The school also has many families that maintain tradition by sending their children there. Paula Oltman, the school's volunteer strings teacher and school board chair, said her three sons went there, and now her grandchildren attend the school.

"Last year we had a preschooler who was fourth-generation," Lindsay said.

This year, most of the teachers are new. Lindsay is in his second year, and Oltman has been teaching music at the school for four years. Last year, Lindsay said, two of the teachers left for health issues and one got another job.

But Lindsay and Oltman are excited about the new teachers at the school.

"We have one who's been a missionary all her life," Lindsay said. "She's taught in Thailand and in the Philippines."

The school's music program is fairly extensive, with most of the students learning violin at some point during their education, and several participating in a handbell choir.

"I'd say music is a pretty big focus," Oltman said. "We minister toward others through music."

In addition to performing in churches, the students also play music at retirement facilities around town.

The small school also does various forms of community service. Locally, they pick up trash around town and hold a community service day two to three times a month, where they volunteer at assisted living facilities. They also take the eighth graders on a mission trip each year, and have traveled as far away as Kenya to build churches.

The school will hold a 75th anniversary dinner on Oct. 15.
