Entered as second-class matter October 6, 1905, at the post office at Lexington, Oregon, under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

THURSDAY FEBRUARY 8, 1906.

The testimony of Captain Cousins, of the Queen, corroborated by his fellow-navigators, who were quite comfortable in the Queen's cabins, while women and children were perishing on the Valencia; offers an admirable illustration of the usefulness of theory as compared with practice, says the Oregonian. At the conference on the Queen the theory was pretty generally adopted that it was impossible to launch a boat, but this was qualified by the belief that, if a boat had been launched, it would have been impossible for it to live in such a sea, and, further, if it had "lived" and reached the wreck, it could not have worked out to open sea again. Over on the Valencia, while this discussion was in progress, theory was away below par and the time for debate limited, so the men who were confronted by a condition launched a cumbersome life raft over the weather side of the wreck and disproved the conclusions of the theorists on the Queen by working it clear of the wreck and the land and carrying eighteen men to safety, while the Queen, for which they were heading, was running away. This is a portion of the damning evidence against Captain Cousins which cannot be explained away. His theories might have obtained credence had there been no survivors to tell of what actually occurred in those last awful hours on the Valencia.

A. Bennett, of Irrigon, says, in the Oregonian, that The Wheatfield is making its influence felt in an agitation for electric lights and a water system. The water works, we had before the berth of The Wheatfield and the electric lights we have now. Both good systems.

A wreck occurred on the Main line of the O. R. & N. at Bridal Veil, on Tuesday morning, in which four were killed and six dangerously injured. Among the killed was Edward L. Sinnott, traveling salesman for the American Type Foundry Co., of Portland. The writer has known Mr. Sinnott for nearly five years and during our service with the Type Foundry we worked under Mr. Sinnott about five months, who then had charge of the presses in the Foundry. Ed. was a first class pressman and a leading member of the Pressmen's Union.
