Peaches in Turkish Mode. Peaches cooked in Turkish fashion are served with boiled rice. Peel the peaches by plunging them in boiling water, then remove the stone through slit in one side, without injuring the shape of the peach. Fill hollows with seeded raisins and arrange in baking dish; sprinkle liberally with sugar and set in hot oven 20 minutes. Have ready a dish lined with boiled rice Spread over it peaches, and serve with dressing made of cocoanut milk thickened with cornstarch and sweetened with granulated sugar.

On the same day the Shingu Maru went ashore near Atsuta, her complement of 130 being saved by revenue steamers. The Kwannon Maru, which was driven into Toba for shelter, had some of her boats rushed by panic-stricken passengers who thought she was about to founder. The boat crews left the vessel and their fate was uncertain when the Antilochus left. The vessel ultimately reached Yokkaichi in safety.

THE PARIS APACHES,

How They Deal With Their Unlucky Victims.

The floods in Paris afforded golden opportunities to the thieves and hooligans-the dreaded "Apaches"-of the French capital. A Paris correspondent sends an interesting account of these reckless men and their methods and weapons.

"The desperate criminals who make a specialty of night attacks are a bloodthirsty, cowardly set of ruffians, and as they are always armed to the teeth and hold human life cheap, a solitary citizen going home late, or a policeman on a lonely beat has very little chance against them.

"When they have once made up their minds to rob a passerby-which one does not matter much-it is more than likely they will decide to begin operations at once. That means that three Apaches will take up a position on the pavement and pretend to be engaged in innocent gossip. The street is deserted. A solitary pedestrian comes into sight. In a moment he is measured up by the three scoundrels on the lookout for their prey. There is not a policman in sight. The moment is favorable.

"'He has a gold chain,' says one.
"'He'll do,' says the chief of the criminal trio. 'Get ready.'

"They continue to converse until the stranger reaches them. Involuntarily he glances at them as he passes. That is sufficient.

"'What do you mean by looking at us like that?' asks the chief in an insolent tone. Then, turning to his companions, he remarks, 'Hasn't he got an ugly mug?

"The pedestrian, however little he may be inclined to quarrel with the evil-looking rufflans who have accosted him, is unlikely to take their insults in silence. But at his first word of protest one of the group advances on him with a menacing air.

"'What!' he exclaims, 'I'll show you "The stranger stands on his guard but immediately another member of the trio bounds upon him from behind. seizes him around the neck with his cries for help are stifled in his throat, and if he succeeds in making a sound the arm which presses against his throat is tightened and he loses con

"While this is going on another of the accomplices goes through the victim's pockets, while the third keeps watch for the police. Then, when everything worth taking has been ap propriated, the wretch who has almost strangled the victim releases his arm, gives him a violent push and sends him headlong to the pavement where he will lie senseless for half an

"But things do not always pass so easily. Sometimes the victim shows more resistance than was expected, and then the Apaches have to modify their plans. He must either be stunned with a blow from a mutton-bone or given a stab with a knife or dagger The mutton-bone used by the Paris Apache is a terrible weapon. In ap pearance it resembles a small hatchet without a handle, is about six inches long, and comes from the shoulder of the sheep. This and the knife and the knuckle-iron are the favorite weapons of the Paris hooligan. They are effective and noiseless, whereas the use of the revolver is likely to attract the police. "Among the more recent methods invented by the Paris Apache for renof resistance is the lasso. At the favorable moment a cord from 15 to 20 feet in length and ending in a run-Trains for success in the Industries.
