The countess' beautiful face was the open air, but the captain shook set and determined; she had not spoken, but storm was raging in her heart Three days later the captain told his prisoner that a new guest was expected; that she was a lady of the court, charged with conspiracy against the government.

The chevalier laughed. "I should not be surprised to find an old acquaintance in the fair conspirator."

The captain's eyes grew round and his honest face expressed surprise, but he made no comment.

The following morning Countess Ro siny arrived. The apartment adjoining that of the chevalier was given her and the prisoners met in the presence of Captain Euler at the breakfast table. The greeting that Chevalier di Leon gave was guite a surprise to the countess; he acted courteously, but gave not the least sign that he had ever met her before. When the breakfast showing that his bill had been paid. was over he retired to the reading room, where the countess followed him, without the captain.

are the pleasantest comrade that 1 ever had, but I am troubled. The continuous indoor life is beginning to tell on me. I am used to much exercise in the open air, and I have many things that I am worried about."

A few days later Captain Euler told the prisoners that they would be allowed to spend the evenings on the roof of the building.

The countess watched Chevalier di Leon's face very closely when the cap tain told them this and saw the gleam of real pleasure in his eyes.

That evening they were taken to the roof of the building; to be accurate, to a section of the roof which was surrounded by a high wall, so high that it prevented them from seeing the courtyard beneath, or anything but the stars and the pale face of the full moon.

It was springtime.

"Don't you think this would be an ideal place to send up fire rockets?" He looked toward the stars; his eyes wandered over the dark blue firmament restlessly.

"You are playing with fire all the time," remarked the countess, as she moved nearer to the chevalier.

"Have you ever heard of a case where people were married in a prison?" she continued. "No, I never have."

"Chevalier, will you tell me one thing-frankly, honestly?" Her voice was tender and soft.

"Anything you ask, countese." "Are you engaged to be married?" "I am not." The firmness of his roice was enough to assure the countess that he told the truth. "Are you in love?"

"In love?" he repeated thoughtfully. 'I don't know; all I know is that I have an image, a saint enshrined in my heart, of whom I think, for whose velfare I am fighting and suffering. If that is love, then I am in love."

The countess sighed, a sob broke from her heaving bosom and she let her shoulder lean heavily against him: she buried her face in his shoulder and the tears trickled down her soft cheeks as she sighed:

"I am so very, very unhappy." The chevalier bent his head over her and his eyes became dark for a second; then he folded her in his arms and their lips met in a kiss.

The spell was short; the next m ment the countess stood up and the chevalier picked her up and placed her on the bench again, as if she were a little child; then he turned and randown the stairs to his prison.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Fireworks.

Every evening after that, except when it stormed, the prisoners went up on the roof. These evenings were the pleasantest part of the days.

During the day the chevaller read the daily papers and magazines with great interest. He found plenty of engrossing news there, especially the preparations of the confederated navy and army. One article, very well written by one of the chief engineers, particularly attracted his attention. That article described the Z ray and its destroyer. The supply station of destruction was Madeira, from which place heavy cables were laid to reach the 30th longitudinal meridian, along which the Z ray ran. The heaviest current of electricity was conducted by this tremendous cable to three spe that we are alone, I greet you with cially built boats. Di Leon man would have envied the prison seemed to be an expert; he soon had in which the chevalier was killing a large Japanese wheel, several turning stars and also a number of long sky rockets ready.

When evening came they excitedly prepared for the grand fireworks. The sky was clear and the moon had not yet risen. Chevaller di Leon arranged the different pieces, and when the captain came up he fired the first air runner. The long rocket went high up in the air, whirring and whistling, and then, with a puff, broke into thousands of red sparks. Another puff brought white and the third brought blue.

The next was the Japanese sun; this was fastened to the center of the roof. It circled and sparkled for a long time.

The chevalier was deeply interested in his projectiles and, as the countess assisted him, Captain Euler had to play the part of audience. There was a larger audience outside their inclosure, but that was another world.

When all the set pieces were used the chevalier looked up in the sky, seemingly searching for something; at last his hand went into his pocket and, bringing out an object not unlike a Browning pistol, he said: "And now. ladies and gentlemen, I will show you something new in the pyrotechnical art."
