B. A. WALKER DIES

Baldwin A. Walker, familiarly known to Mosierites as "Dad" Walker, died last Friday at the hospital in The Dalles, at the age of 68 years. Death was due to a complication of troubles.

About a week previous to his death Mr. Walker was taken suddenly ill while at work and the doctor was called in and gave him treatment for his ailment and for a time he appeared to improve. He lived alone in a little cabin he built last fall. The cabin was no place for a sick man or for those neighbors who took it upon themselves to attend to his wants, so the city authorities had him taken to the hospital for treatment. He lived but a few days after reaching the hospital.

B. A. Walker had married daughters and sisters, some of whom were well able to take care of him, but he lived in poverty and squalor and died in misery and and want and was buried in Potter's Field.

A prominent business man who had befriended Mr. Walker, wrote a letter to a sister of the dead man, about a week previous to his demise, stating his condition and needs, and asked for some assistance from them for the old man.

A letter received from this sister during the week proves that blood is not always thicker than water, for in it the sister says "my brother can lay no claim whatsoever to any charity from any of his relatives."

Very little was known here of Mr. Walker, except what he chose to tell, and his accounts were very conflicting. Judging from his sister's letter he was evidently considered a black sheep and a disgrace to his very "highly connected family."

Our Motto

The man who supplies you with the food that goes on your table is the most important of all the tradesmen with whom you deal. Out of what he sells you, you are literally made. He feeds your wife and your family and all those dear to you. You have a right to demand that he be intelligent; that he be clean; that he be alive to the dignity of his calling; that he give you value for your money; that he shall not substitute nor tell a lie in his blends; that he shall not deceive you nor be a party to some one else's deceit. In short, that he render you a real social service.

Such service you will receive at the Pure Food Grocery and at a saving every day in the year. Why not make up your mind right now to try Strauss?
