STUCK IN MUD FOR FIVE HOURS
The assistance of the State of Washington and the Bailey Gatzert was necessary last Friday to pull the steamer Dalles City out of the mud where she had grounded after loading at the local dock. The boat had been heavily loaded here with fruit and other freight, and was stuck in the mud for five hours before being able to continue on her journey. With the aid of cables the other two steamers finally succeeded in getting the vessel loose, after half an hour's work. The big stern wheels of all three of the river boats plowed up the mud.
A dredger is expected this week from Portland and will excavate about six feet in front of the dock. The water this year in the Columbia river is lower than it has been for a good many years.
Had it not been that the steamer Tahoma was taking her lay-over in Portland on that day, all of the river craft plying between Portland and The Dalles would no doubt have been congregated around the Dalles City.

STORY OF NATHANIEL AND MARY COE
(By Mrs. T. R. Coon.)
In compiling this sketch I am indebted for information to the writings of Mrs. C. Coe, Laurence Coe, Mrs. Elizabeth Lord, Mrs. Camilla Donnell and Mrs. E. S. Joslyn, as to the kindness of Mrs. Kittie Coe.
Nathaniel Coe, a native of Morris county, New Jersey, was born September 12, 1788. His father, Joel Coe, was a native of England, his mother, Hulda Horton, was a native of New York City, and traced her ancestry in America back five generations. Barnabas Horton built the first frame building erected on the east end of Long Island. It was built in 1669 and in June, 1873, was still in a good state of preservation. It has always been owned and occupied by a descendant of Barnabas Horton, of the Horton name.
In 1795, when Nathaniel was seven years old, his parents moved to Scipio, New York, going by sloop to Albany in four days; from there they went with an ox team, by way of Cayuga, Wood Creek and Auburn to their destination. The entire trip required one month. We find no record of how his youthful days were passed, but we learn that early in life he was an accomplished penman and traveled through the southern states teaching penmanship, and studying the resources and conditions of the south. Later he studied law. In the war of 1812 he was captain of a company of soldiers from New York.
He was married in Auburn, N. Y., October 5, 1817, to Mary Taylor White, daughter of Laurence and White and Cyria Charge. Mary White was born on Pearl street, near Broadway, New York, March 11, 1801. Of her early life we know little, but as the wife of Nathaniel Coe we find her an educated, Christian woman, an able writer of both prose and poetry, and a fitting companion to her husband. A lover's poem, by Nathaniel Coe, to "Miss Mary White," is still in existence; it is a beautiful and touching poem, and is as perfect as though made by a modern printing press.
In 1829 they moved to Nunda, N. Y., remaining there until they came west. There their children are of the first and their children; there their two little girls were both laid to rest; Cornelia at the age of ten, and Susan Amelia in infancy. For the death of Cornelia the mother never ceased to grieve. Of Susan Amelia she wrote:
"O Susan, like a dewdrop kissed off by the sun's morning beam,
Thou art no more, and I am left alone,
A beautiful existence was given,
Whose soul seemed to come down to earth in a dream,
Only to wake up when it ascended to Heaven."
Nathaniel Coe possessed a thorough education and a vigorous mind. Besides his law practice he engaged in the mercantile business and in horticulture; of the latter he was passionately fond.
A writer in "Horton's Genealogy," says: "He was an honest lawyer and an upright politician and always commanded the respect and esteem of his fellow men. He was long a magistrate and for four years in succession represented Livingston and Allegheny counties in the legislature of New York. He was often an arbitrator, both in and out of court. In religion he was, what was then called by way of reproach, a Radical. He was a thoroughly anti-slavery man, and while the Liberty party was in existence, he was its firm and warm supporter.
In his autograph album are given the names: Silas Wright, Martin Van Buren, Hamilton Fish, J. C. Calhoun, Samuel Tilden, Horatio Seymour, Speaker of Assembly, Millard Fillmore, Levi Chase and Horace Greeley.
In 1851, when he was 63 years of age, he received the appointment of postal agent for Oregon from President Fillmore. To accept this trust was to plunge into the wilderness where the rights of the settlers of unpopulated and civilization a dream of the future. Most people of that age would shrink from such an undertaking, but Nathaniel Coe did not hesitate. Accompanied by his son, Eugene, he came by the way of the isthmus of Panama. On the way he established his headquarters. From there postal routes were laid from British Columbia to California, from the Pacific ocean to the Rocky mountains. Wherever the pioneer had been the postal routes were made to follow with his letters and papers from home.
Postal Agent Coe traveled many long miles in canoe, on horseback or on foot, enduring hardships and fatigue that would have disheartened the majority of younger men. After two years of this country he was so well pleased with the country that he sent for his family to join him. On December 12, 1853, Mrs. Coe and her three sons, Laurence, Charles and Henry, embarked on the side wheel steamer Georgia. Eight days later they reached the city of Astoria. The town then consisted of a few small houses, with a sea beach in front and a tropical forest behind.
In crossing the isthmus they had several very thrilling experiences. Mrs. Coe rode a mule and Henry, nine years of age, was carried on the back of the native guide, Laurence and Charles walked. Five days were consumed in the crossing from Astoria to Panama where Mrs. Coe and Henry took passage on the steamer California for San Francisco. Laurence and Charles were detained to look after the baggage until next steamer day. Henry was very ill with Panama fever on the trip up the coast and Mrs. Coe waited in San Francisco with him, until the arrival of the other sons, when they all took passage on the steamer Fremont for Portland, which they reached after a tempestuous voyage. Mr. Coe and Eugene were there to welcome them to the "Land of Promise." They were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Thos. J. Dryer, at their residence in Portland. Mr. Dryer was founder and editor of the Oregonian. The rest of the family remained in Portland some months looking for a location.
At one time they decided to secure land on the east side of the Willamette river, just across from the village of Portland, and an option was taken on a large number of acres. Then the grandeur and wild beauty of eastern Oregon, the glorious climate, the advantages of a location in the gorge of the great river of the west was considered, and the location was given up in favor of eastern Oregon. A bill of lumber was ordered from Bradford mill at the Cascades, the lumber to be shipped to The Dalles for the purpose of erecting a store building in that little hamlet. Mr. Coe had heard of the disastrous venture of W. C. Laughlin and Dr. Farnsworth on Dog river in the winter of 1852 and '53, but was nevertheless interested in that locality and foresaw future possibilities.
In the spring of 1854 Mr. and Mrs. Coe and Henry made an excursion to The Dalles. They left Portland in the morning on the side wheel steamer Fashion, Van Bergen, master, and reached the Lower Cascades at night, where they were entertained at the home of B. B. Bishop, a brother-in-law of the Bradfords.
The Bradford was six miles in length. At the Upper Cascades the Bradfords had just completed a schooner of 40 tons burden which made trips to The Dalles when the wind was favorable. On this schooner they took passage and being favored with a good breeze they made the trip in three days. They landed for a brief survey and were delighted with what they saw. Reembarking they reached The Dalles that night. They remained over one day, returning on the little propeller Allen, Tom Gladwell captain. This was the only steamer on the river at that time.

RANDOM IMPRESSIONS OF A HIGHWAY HIKER
(By G. E. Stewart)
To eastern friends, and even to those closer home, whose misfortune it is to be as yet uninitiated, the undertaking to paint a word picture of all the bejeweled trophies of nature with which the Cascade Range is decked, would perhaps not altogether be regarded as an act of presumption. But to most of us folks living along where communion with nature is as nearly as much of our hands and faces—word painting will not do. Our vision is already intoxicated with it; our souls have assimilated it; our lives are, indeed, a part of it.
The writer, therefore, desists from attempted elucidating. He leisurely hiked along the highway from Portland, and, of course, viewed all from the most diverse angles, and all were glimpsed via chugging auto or any other speeding conveyance. For example, from an auto you fail, at this season, to get much inspiration from the view of a dense veil of fog grimly closing over Rooster Rock, and over the miles of agitated waters far below—and when the rugged eminence and neighboring crags are lashed by a furious, drenching rain. Nor, perchance, do these nature-loving autoists relish the lightning flashes or the bull-bellowing of the god of thunder, just a few score feet above, who seemed self-elected to wreak vengeance upon the science and engineering skill of mere man for daring the feat of embellishing or striving to make over the beautiful but unadorned Mother Nature's handiwork. Nor can the automobile enthusiast incline himself, or herself, to the discernment of the unexpected beauties of some of the Wear, Willies, and Dusty Rhodes with whom fate might bring the hiker into contact.
"I should worry," is the unconventional motto I adopted when starting on this tramp, and to maintain it and live it, notwithstanding the ceaseless rain, and the sharp rocks and mud on unfinished stretches of highway, and dodging the mud of a half-hundred bespattered touring cars and spitting "hot-stuff" trucks, served me a handy to an otherwise cold-footed, weather-beaten amateur.
Incidentally may I add that on arriving here, I found a different Hood River than that which I saw some twenty or thirty years ago when first I tramped this way. Then it had all the outstanding earmarks of the almost obsolete crossroads hamlet. Now it smacks of the metropolis. It breathes progress. Its people are hustling, hospitable, and its surety will be, Ten, twenty, thirty years hence its increasing populace will rise up and call its sponsors blessed.
MOSIER PEARS, PRUNES PRAISED AT FAIR
(From Hood River Glacier)
In a letter to The Glacier last week C. N. Ravlin has great praise to offer the Mosier pears and prunes. Mr. Ravlin declares that Hood River products, although the shipments have been light, have all been up to the usual high standard. He urges local growers to co-operate with him in keeping high class local fruits before the thousands who are now visiting the fair. Mr. Ravlin's letter follows:
An disappointed at the small showing of Hood River products at the fair in fresh stuff, especially as the Commission offered to pay all express and transportation charges.
What we have had from Hood River has been of the very highest standard, and I am convinced we could have gone right down the line in vegetables and fruits and more than held our own with any other district.
Koberg's egg plant, entered with the jury last week, was the finest I have ever seen.
Mosier d'Anjou pears and Italian prunes have been by far the finest exhibited at the exposition. Whisler, several years ago, told us we had the best d'Anjou district in the world. From what I have seen of the exhibition here in comparison with the Mosier entry of d'Anjou, I am convinced that Whisler knew what he was talking about.
From my knowledge of what we can do with those pears I am confident we can excel in this variety, also. Hood River should get busy and send in some entries of both Hosc and d'Anjou, and demonstrate to others our superiority. We will have to "go some" to beat the Mosier entry of d'Anjou. These were all perfect specimens, beautifully clear skinned, and packed sixty to the box.

Have been trying all over Oregon to get entries on sugar corn, but thus far haven't had a single entry. We can beat California, hands down, in this line. Every entry they have had, has been wormy, and of very poor quality, from an Oregon standard. There is a splendid market here in San Francisco for Oregon sugar corn.
Rogue River Valley has shown more enterprise in exhibiting here for award than all the other districts of Oregon put together. To date that district has had 68 entries of pears, 32 entries of peaches, several of cantaloupes, currants, raspberries, cherries, and various varieties of vegetables.
Coeos county, at present, has a splendid exhibit of Gravenstein apples in my department, which is attracting a great deal of attention.
In the meantime, I have a sign on our Hood River display, stating "these apples are all from last year's crop." This is to offset the display of 1915 apples being shown by Idaho, New York, and Washington.
With best regards, I am Sincerely, Ravlin.
STATE FAIR IN SWING THIS WEEK
Oregon's big state fair at Salem is in full swing this week. With exhibits of merit from many counties the fair is attracting more attention than formerly. Tomorrow will be state press day, and newspaper men from all over Oregon will be present to enjoy the program prepared for them by Mrs. Edith Tozier-Weathered, who has been assisting W. A. Jones place the fair on the map.
The Refrigerator Lid. Refrigerator and icebox lids have a way of hanging down upon the head of the person who is seeking victuals or ice in the top compartment. This may easily be prevented by fastening to the wall a curved piece of spring brass, projecting in such a way that it will catch the refrigerator lid when this is pushed up, but will not hold it so tightly that the lid cannot be closed again without effort.
It Glanced Off. Mrs. Wickfield looked over the room which the maid had pronounced finished.
"Mary Ann," she said, "if you will take a sweeping glance around this room I think you will find that you have given it a very glancing sweep." Ladies' Home Journal.
Romeo and Juliet. "Was Romeo and Juliet?" Inquired a pupil of the teacher.
"No, my son," replied the wise man. "It was Juliet who was found-dead by Romeo."
Careworn man in all ages soved vainly to reap despair.—Goethe.
