NAPHTHA.

The Natural Products and Those Obtained From Petroleum.

Naphtha is an inflammable liquid which exudes from the soil in certain parts of Persia. Subsequently the use of the term spread to include some volatile oils found in Europe and even America. The product of the oil fields or southern Russia is usually called naphtha, although it differs in no way from the ordinary grades of petroleum.

Naphtha properly includes the fighter oils which pass off first in the distillation of petroleum, the gravities ranging from 90 to 62 degrees Beaume. Pennsylvania crude oil contains from 8 to 20 per cent of naphtha. In the refining of such naphtha several proda work pass off first-. rings one and cymogene-are are seldom saved. The next product is known as gasoline, a material largely used in muchines and for illuminating purposes. After this come stove caphtha and gas naphtha, the latter being the base of much of the Illuminating gas now made.
