This reminded one of the crowd of another story, his personal experience. In the early dayys when the woods were full of game the narrator of this story was quite a hunter, although only a 14-year-old boy. He was hunting one day when he saw a large fourpoint buck standing broadside at a little distance. Not wishing to spoil any meat, he took careful aim at the deer's head and fired. He had confidence enough in his marksmanship to know he didn't miss, but was surprised to see the deer run away from the spot. Investigation showed a dead deer, shot squarely through the head, and a trail of blood leading from the place. Following this a short distance, he heard a fluttering in the brush and picked up a nat ve pheasant with his head shot off. ", he traff found a second buck as large is the to assess the cost theerof upon the first stone dead, shot through the heart. There wasn't any creek near by or he might have killed a few fish with that same bullet, he explained apologetically.
