

A WOMAN'S TRIP TO CRATER LAKE

Crater Lake is lifted high in the arms of the mighty Cascade Range of mountains. Nature seems to have placed this pearl of sublime beauty amid the wildest surroundings in order to evoke and call for the man's most daring spirit. Until August, 1908, the automobile, man's latest triumph in eliminating time and space, had not yet ventured to penetrate the wilds which intervene between the city of Medford and the bold summits that look down upon the imprisoned waters of the lake. It was known at that time that E. H. Harriman, the king figure in the railroad world, was going to come up from his hunting lodge in Klamath county and spend a few days at the lake—and the committee of the Medford Commercial Club was anxious to meet him there, and bring him to Medford.

A party was organized with five autos. Mrs. John D. Olwell drove the one in the lead. She covered the distance of 83 miles to the lake in ten and one-half hours of continuous travel. She rushed it through Union Creek, over the rocks and the dashing flood at a furious speed, for it seemed a doubtful attempt at best.

The swift water rushed the bed of the machine and carried away Judge Colvig's "field glasses" (7), but luckily Wes. Green, one of the party, recovered them it half mile below lodged in a drift. (The stopper had come out).

Night came on. We had reached the foot of the mountains. It was dark. There had been neglect in supplying any carbide for the light. It was then the sterner sex quailed. The "Judge" remarked that he had but little life insurance and that it would be foolhardy to attempt that mountain road without lights, etc., etc., but the little woman at the wheel said:

"Well, we are going into Crater Camp tonight, or bust every tire on the machine."

And we did go, around curves, over rocks, stumps, brush and other obstructions. Finally through the dark primeval forest, in the depth of a rocky canon a light was seen, and the lady at the wheel, eager to be the pioneer in driving an auto to Crater Lake, opened every valve on the machine, pointed its nose down the mountain, and fairly made a hole through the darkness as she rushed the monster into the tent city of Camp Steel. This was the first auto ever driven over the Crater Lake road—and Mrs. Olwell ran it every inch of the way. "JUDGE."

WOMAN GIVES HER IDEA OF RANCHING IN ROGUE

(MAUD SHERMAN COWLES.)
I believe that farming is about to become as much a practical business among the younger generation of American gentlemen as ever it was in our Colonial days, only now we have science as a powerful ally. I also am inclined to believe that for farming and orcharding no more favorable conditions can be found in the country than right here in the glorious Rogue River Valley.
