ROOSEVELT.

the senate wing of the Capitol, Roosevelt took Gardner and Nelson by the hand and, turning to Taft, urged that was take up the insurgent cause. That was one of Roosevelt's last acts during his administration, the report declares.

Roosevelt declared it seemed he would be encroaching on the prerogatives of his successor if he publicly endorsed the insurgents. He said he had been dealing with these things in his own way and his successor would want to do the same without any interference. Throughout the interview the only objection Roosevelt made to a public declaration of sympathy with the insurgents was the fact that his successor might be embarrassed.

For an hour and a half Roosevelt talked over questions connected with the insurgent movement. The committee outlined various projects. Repeatedly Roosevelt evinced a desire to aid the cause, seeking only a way that would not leave him open to a charge of having interfered with Taft.

"Well, Mr. President," said Gardner, "will you ask Mr. Taft to do what he can for us?"

With an impulsive gesture, Roosevelt grasped Gardner and Nelson by the hand and led them to where Taft stood. Roosevelt briefly explained to Taft the plans of the insurgents had made to fight the rules and Cannon, and pleaded for five minutes for support for the insurgent cause, ending: "At least keep your hands off."

Taft listened to the fervid plea, threw up his hands and turned the matter off in a joking way.

The insurgents, however, it was learned authoritatively today, have kept in close touch with the former president. Letter after letter has been sent to Africa quoting insurgent leaders here. Many of them, it is learned, have been answered, but the answers have been kept carefully guarded.

These letters, it is said, account in part for the intimate knowledge of the political situation he was found to have had when he dodged the pitfalls set for him by the correspondents who first met him when he began his return journey to America.

DRYDOCK DEWEY SINKS IN PHILIPPINES STORM

VALLEJO, Cal., May 24.—The drydock Dewey, which is reported sunk in Philippine waters, was installed at Olongapo, Subig Bay, Manila, by Naval Constructor W. G. Dubose and Chief Carpenter W. W. Cowles, who are now at the Mare Island navy yard here.

Cowles said that the drydock probably sank in a naval officers when the huge steel tank was put in place. He laughed at the suggestion that Japan might have been interested in its destruction, saying that the Japanese vessels, as well as those of other nations, frequently used the drydock after paying the government for the privilege. He expressed belief that the Dewey would be raised.
