CHAPTER IV.

VEN as Mrs. Sumter strove to an sure Miss Arnold that a military arrest was far more portentous in sound that in effect, omething in Kate's determined slience and Miriam's insistence added to the effect of these rumors.

Then another thing weighed heavily pop the brave beart of this loving friend and mother. Never had she knows her child to be so silent, so strange, as now. Ever since Friday ght she seemed to avoid all mention of the affair, to shrink from the subshe who had ever been frankness she who had never had a fat the mother did not share. She afar down the valley had come back, reporting that the ambulance mules were found, huddled together, half starved and still half barnessed, in a log shack or shelter to which their instinct had guided them after their beels had made chopsticks of the running gear. The ambulance body was snowed under somewhere and nowhere in sight. The driver, a civilian employed in the quartermaster's de-partment, had totally disappeared. Scott, the paymaster; Thomas, his clerk, and Rafferty, Lanier's soldier servant, or "striker," as then called, were still half dazed.

One more unfortunate, the driver of Foster's sleigh, was in trouble. Not until two hours after the dance bad be turned up with the missing equipage, a cock and bull story, and a case of what the corporal called "jag." He swore that, having got chilled through, walting, he just thought to get one hot whisky at the store. Sentry No. 6 said he'd mind the team while the driver went in, and the next thing be knew "they'd run'd away, hell for leather," and he, their driver, had to follow two miles to Flint's reach, close to town, where be "might have taken a nip or two more." It was his first offense and Foster forgave. It should be remarked, however, that No. 6 declared that it was not be with whom the driver left the sleigh, but two "fellers"—i. e., troopers—who hap-pened to be near the store.
