

Liner of the Cavalry

By Gen. Chas. King Author of "The Colonel's Daughter," "Foes in Ambush," etc.

CHAPTER V. ENNIS and Schuchardt started at sight of Lanier's white face. Ennis sprang to his side. "Help me off with these," he said, "and bring a lamp. Come upstairs, Barker." There were but two sleeping rooms aloft in the little bachelor set. Into this room marched Bob Lanier and threw open the door of the single closet wherein was hanging uniform and civilian garb in some confusion. Ennis held the lamp on high, and with his free hand Lanier began throwing out the contents—a new uniform dress coat, an older one that had done duty for the three previous years, two sack coats or "blouses," etc. Then appeared a suit of evening clothes, carefully handled. The closet was well lighted, and Lanier faced them with the simple words, "It's gone!"

"What's gone?" demanded Ennis. "Why, that dark gray mixture sack suit I brought from leave last year. It always hung way back in here."

"Who wants it now, I'd like to know?" demanded Ennis.

"Our colonel, who accuses me of causing Rawdon for his getaway."

Then Barker spoke: "It's only fair to the colonel to tell the rest, Bob. Rawdon's box, that he left for safe keeping with a friend in town, had not only the suit you saw at the office, but a new fur cap with your name in it."

The day of the storm Quinan came over to the guardhouse after his visit wearing a new cap instead of his old one, and Cassidy swooped on it, thinking it yours, for it was here he got it, and the name in that cap was Rawdon."

It leaked out somehow. Fitzroy hunted the story down."

"The name was burnt out when Cassidy brought it back to me," said Lanier slowly. "He claimed that in lighting his pipe"

"Fool Cassidy led every way he would think of to save you," said Barker ruefully. "It's the young cad who befriended and helped along that wicked you in the end."

"Boped Rafferty in, too, I suppose," said Schuchardt.

"Rafferty, doubtless, to the extent of helping or wheedling him out of Bob's new cap."

"But those were not mine that Fitzroy had" burst in Lanier.

"Of course not. He's left you a worn one in place of the new. Where'd he steal that one, I wonder? There isn't another officer of your size and build at the post. But here, I've got to go back and report, and my report will be in these words: 'Mr. Lanier will be missed too.' And Barker made for the stairs."

"One moment," called Ennis. "You said Bob wasn't the only man this fellow had tricked. Do you mean"— He gazed suggestively.

"I mean—yes—that there's more than one man and there's at least one poor girl in the garrison to mourn that fellow's loss, and be d— to him!" And with that Barker was gone.

Button listened to his adjutant's report with something almost like a gasp. Stannard and Sumter heard it with grave faces, but without a word. Bessie, who had drifted in, sniggered with obvious triumph.

"Gentlemen," said the colonel, "you have not heard the half of what I know, and every day brings something new. This comes in from Laramie to-day, brought with the mail that lay over at the Chugwater during the storm. Read that, Stannard." And Stannard took the paper and glanced over it, blinked his eyes, sniffed and said, "I've heard about that case, and I'll take Lanier's story any day against that fellow's affidavit."

"Major Stannard," said Button severely, "you are speaking contemptuously of your superior officer."

"Colonel Button," answered Stannard, with high head held, but with firm hand on his temper, "I am speaking contemptuously of my superior officer's informant, not of the commanding officer of Fort Laramie. If you care to look you will see that side sergeants, attended by their gallants from the garrison, were having a merry time of it. The moon shone in brilliance. The night air, frosty and still, was full of exhilaration. The officer of the guard, merely cautioning the revelers to control their impulse to shout, had gone on his way with implied permission to keep up the fun, and presently other officers appeared upon the brow of the bluff, interested observers.

The veterinary surgeon, a gray haired man of nearly sixty, who presently came totting up the hillside, touched his fur cap front in salutation to tall Lieutenant Ennis and begged leave to speak a moment with Dr. Schuchardt, whom he led slowly away.

Ennis had attentive ears for the chatter and gossip of a neighboring group that had suspended their strolling for the moment and were curiously watching the pair.

"There's no more the matter with Dora Mayhew than there is with me," "tapt one," said a red cheeked maid of "handmaiden row" to the eager group about her. "She's been daft about that young dude, Rawdon."

"Yes, an' deaf to Cockney Fitz," laughed another.

And Ennis, turning quickly, noted the group, four young noncommissioned officers and three of the garrison girls, all of them toying with the name of good old Mayhew's bonny daughter, she whom that veteran English horseman had taught and guarded with such jealous care. Well had Ennis known of Sergeant Fitzroy's aspirations. Few in the regiment had not, and few there were who did not know that in spite of Mayhew's avowed dislike for him the girl had for a time engaged.

Then in April to Fort Frayne had come this handsome young fellow Rawdon, with better looks, better manners and even, as it seemed, better money, for Rawdon was lavish where Fitzroy was "near," and the favor of the young girl, who had toyed with the Englishman, turned from him to this unknown.

And in this web Bob Lanier had become deeply involved. Ennis was sorely worried.

"Where did you say she was now?" Ennis heard the doctor ask as they rejoined him.
