

Liner of the Cavalry

By Gen. Chas. King

Author of "The Colonel's Daughter," "Foes in Ambush," etc.

"Now, Mr. Lanier, there's the situation. Do you care to say anything to me, or would you prefer to take counsel?"

And Bob Lanier, leaning on his elbow, looked quietly up in the colonel's bearded face and answered:

"Colonel Riggs, I reckon both those men think they're telling the truth, and I may have to prove they're not."

"Do you mean you were there?" queried old Riggs in genuine concern.

"There, sir? Of course I was there—quick as I could get there, but not quick enough, by any manner of means."

Riggs looked grave indeed. "You say you may have to prove it was not you. Don't you know you'll have to if these witnesses are further sustained?"

"Fully, sir, and when my need is known there will be witnesses for the defense. The doctors tell the Raftery may not come round in less than a week. When the time arrives I'll be ready."

"That was the condition of affairs when the eighth and final day of Lanier's close arrest arrived. 'The idea of Bob Lanier spending Christmas in hospital!'" said Mrs. Stannard.

A sunshiny room on the ground floor of the major's big house was duly prepared, and thither just before sunset on Christmas eve our young soldier was piloted by Seuchardt and Ennis, making the trip afoot across the rearward space, yet being remanded to a huge easy chair and partial bandages immediately on his arrival.

"Black Bill," with his incomplete report, had gone back to Omaha to further mystify the adjutant general and to eat his Christmas dinner. At 3 p. m. the day before Christmas came a telegram from — Arnold, Esq., of Standish Bay, Mass., announcing that he would leave forthwith for the west, bringing his sister with him.

The Summers told Mrs. Stannard, and she told Bob Lanier.

It has been said that this young gentleman was an outspoken fellow, with a bit or miss way of saying things when once his mind was made up, and by this time it would seem he had made up his mind.

"Mrs. Stannard, if you think a girl could stand the sight of such a Guy Fawkes as this I would give much to speak ten minutes to Miss Miriam Arnold."

"You're not a Guy Fawkes," said Mrs. Stannard, with fluttering heart. "You've lost something of your mustache and eyebrows, but very little of your good looks, only—"

"Only what?"

"Why, it's going to be much harder to see her now than it was before—before she— And Mrs. Stannard faltered.

"Before she saw me playing St. Somebody or other at the back window and screamed? Nobody knows I heard it except you, and you won't tell. Moreover, it isn't about that that I have to speak."

Mrs. Stannard's bonny face showed instant disappointment.

"There's—there's another matter," said Bob, with trouble in his tones. "I so hoped"— faltered that arch matchmaker.

"So did I, Mrs. Stannard," said downright Bob, "but not with charges hanging over my head. First I've got to meet the enemy."

And yet he wished to see and speak with Miriam, who not once had set foot out of doors since the night of the fire, whose sweet face flamed at every recurring thought of that incident, whose self betrayal covered her with shame and confusion indescribable, who would give years of her young life if she could only escape from Fort Cushing and hide herself a thousand miles away. But not until that stern puritanical father should arrive was leaving to be thought of. A week ago and the tidings of his coming would have filled her with dread. Now she heard them with relief. Father coming, and Aunt Agnes— Aunt Agnes, who never before had been west of the Hudson; Aunt Agnes, whose forebears had waged against witchcraft and woodcraft, against village crows and forest children, against helpless old women and stealthy young savages, all without mercy when delivered into their hands!

Was it in partial reparation for the rapine, the swindling and stealing dealt out by her pilgrim forefathers to the Indian of the east that Aunt Agnes had become the vehement champion of the Indian of the west? President of a famous peace society was she and secretary of the Standish branch of the Friends of the Red Man—a race whom the original and redoubtable Miles had split and skewered and shot without stint or discrimination. And now was Aunt Agnes hastening westward with her brother to reclaim their one eye lamb from the wolf pack of the wilds and incidentally to see for herself something of the haunts and habits of the red brother, in whose behalf these last six months her voice had been uplifted time and again.

Summer came in cheery and laughing for the late family breakfast. Guard mounting was long over, but he had been detained by the colonel.

"It is almost comical," said he, "to see Button's delight in those letters in the New York papers. He's as curious now to know the author of those as he was furious at the supposed author of the others."

"What others?" faltered Miriam Arnold.

"Some bitter attacks on him that appeared in the Boston and Philadelphia papers about that night surprise of Lone Wolf's village—the one he accused Mr. Lanier of having started."

"Accused Mr. Lanier?" And Miriam Arnold, with consternation in her voice, was half rising from the table.

"I had thought it best to say nothing to you about it, Miriam, dear," said Mrs. Sumner gently.

"But, Mrs. Sumner—captain!" interrupted Miriam, wild eyed. "Do you mean Colonel Burton accused Mr. Lanier of those letters?"

"That was the backbone of his grievance against Lanier," said Sumner. "Why?"

"And he didn't deny it—didn't tell what he knew—said it came in such a way he could not tell. Why, Miriam, what do you know?"

"For a moment it looked as though she were on the verge of a hysterical breakdown. Kate sprang to her side and threw an arm around her, but with gallant effort she regained self control.

"I know just who wrote those wicked stories, and I told Mr. Lanier, and I know—and I'm ashamed I ever had to know—who first told them."
