Modocs Back to Klamath After Many Years

The expected arrival of a number of Modoc Indians at the Klamath Indian agency within the near future, where they will receive allotments of land and a share in the tribal funds of the reservation, has revived memories of the incidents that led to the exiling of the Modocs from their former haunts and the act of congress of March, 1908, which removed the liability of the Modocs, has made many of the old pioneers here, who remember the fierce war that led to their exile, feel like the cowboy did who listened to a sermon on the prodigal son.

permit the Indians who refused to occupy the reservation when they could have done so, and fought the troops who went after them, to return at this late day and share in the division of the tribal funds when they have already had an allotment of land in what is now Oklahoma.

whites were worsted. The Modocs then fled to the lava beds on the shores of Tule lake, and for six long months the little band of warriors defied all the United States troops that were sent against them.

were allowed to return to their former home. Now it is understood that a number of them are on their way here, and when they arrive they will receive their allotments the same as though they had never rebelled against the government.

acres that belonged to the Indians had been left out of the reservation. In lieu of this a commission which was appointed to settle the question awarded the Indians the sum of $537,007.20. This fund is partly used up, some of it having been used for the purchase of cattle for the Indians and other portions of it in various other ways.

will have to dispose of their allotments in Oklahoma and pay their own expenses to this city, and from here to the reservation.

tural land or the 160 acres of grazing land which comprises an allotment, are worth coming after, to say nothing of the share in the tribal funds, which will be created by the sale of the reservation lands.
