Percolated Coffee is always good coffee

The secret of making good coffee is simple-- don't let it boil. Boiled coffee contains tannic acid, which spoils the natural flavor and aroma of the berry. The only way to make coffee that will have all the original flavor and zest is by percolation.

The G.E. Percolator will make delicious coffee in a few minutes, using electricity for heat.

The action is very simple. The ground coffee is placed in the perforated receptacle at the top and cold water in the reservoir below.

When the electric current is turned on a small amount of water is heated and forced up through the tube, where it sprays over the coffee and percolates back into the reservoir.

This process is practically continuous, and produces a delicious beverage, containing all the stimulating and wholesome properties of coffee, without the harmful element—tannic acid.

Convenience of the G.E. Percolator.

Coffee may be made on the dining room table, or in any room in the house where there is an electric light socket.

As no fire is necessary, there can be no danger, and there is no smoke, soot or gas to be guarded against in using the percolator.

Think of the convenience of being able to make coffee in a few minutes, without going to the kitchen, or leaving the presence of your friends, who perhaps are waiting to enjoy it with you.
