BASEBALL

(Copyright, 1911, by George Matthew Adams.)

The good old game is under way, so let us watch the players play, without a grief or fear; oh, let us sit like brooding owls, and howl again the same old howls that we put up last year.

We'll roast a player when he makes a series of disastrous breaks, and call him names like "quince," and if himself he should redeem, we'll hail him with a joyous scream and say he is a prince.

We'll have an idol every day, and say he has not feet of clay; our plaudits will resound; we'll praise him till he muffs the ball, and then the same old names we'll call, and hoot him from the ground.

And in these happy baseball days we'll resurrect each chestnut phrase from out our pile of junk; we'll call men boneheads when they try in vain to stop a whizzing fly, and say their work is punk. We'll sit and chew the same old rags, and spring again the same old gags, and make the same old bets. We'll use the same sarcastic strokes, and all the prehistoric jokes, and breathe the same old threats. I wish there would arise a man, a gifted, soulful baseball fan, a being real and true, who would upon the bleachers sit, and throw some novel sort of fit, and yell out something new!—Walt Mason.
