A New Method for Fireproofing Buildings at Small Cost By General Sooy Smith of Medford

The prime requisites of a building are strength, durability, lightness, economy and resistance to fire. These, and others which will appear in this description of the Sooy-Smith System.

The steel frame should be covered inside and outside with strong wire cloth and thoroughly covered with a white wash of Portland cement and then plastered inside and outside with asbestos plaster three-fourths of an inch thick on the inside and 1 1/4 inches thick on the outside, so carefully laid on that not a crack or crevice could occur.

side coating could be polished and marked to look like stone masonry. Before this polishing a wash of Portland cement, tinted to imitate granite or other stone may be put on and this will close any infinitesimal cracks that might remain in the plaster and it would further secure its durability.

low water-level to permit 12x12 inch caps to be placed upon them and drift bolted to them, and a solid platform of 12x12 inch laid on these caps and drift bolted to them; all this woodwork to be well below water level, as wood never rots under water.

consist of one part best Portland cement and two parts asbestos, thoroughly mixed and laid on in proper plastic condition. Both coverings should extend from the foundation to the comb of the roof inside and outside without crack or flaw.

where it cannot, to a depth at which the frictional resistance on the sides of the piles and the point resistance at the bottom would be amply sufficient to carry the weight of the building and of bearing of the platform.

bridge sets for the superstructure. This feature is desirable but not absolutely necessary. The resistance of the earth underlying the platform will so far diminish the load upon the piles, and this resistance and that of the piles should be at least four times as great as the loads to be provided for.
