gate tried to snatch the New Hampshire standard. The uniformed police broke it up in a hurry.

At this time Kentucky, Texas, New York, Mississippi, Illinois and Louisiana and Ohio were the only states whose standards remained in place.

"Dark Horse Saddled"

The Roosevelt part of the Ohio delegation cheered wildly and tried to join the procession, but the Taft supporters representing the president's home state held the standard so that they could not carry it.

New York and Indiana were on their chairs and there was a wild scuffle on the faces of the leaders. They openly asserted that they believed that the stable door was open and that the "dark horse" was being saddled. The remainder of the California, Oregon and Maryland delegates were chanting in unison, "We want Teddy; we want Teddy." The Hadley shouters were getting the better of it and the California delegates started a rival demonstration.

William Barnes, leader of the Taft forces was asked what he thought of the demonstration. He said:

Bryan Says Like '06

"I am waiting to see what they are going to do with these contests. I am not discussing any compromise proposition. I am just waiting for the return of these delegates and order to be restored. I don't believe many of these men who are cheering know what they are cheering about."

William J. Bryan, with a broad smile on his face, said: "This looks like 1896. You can't tell where a thing like this will end."

"I don't know what in the world they are cheering about," said Governor Hadley when the cheering kept on and on, without any apparent diminution.

Senator Dixon, Roosevelt's campaign manager, stood watching the tumult.

"That's the first real demonstration indicating the temper of the convention and it is a tribute to the work Governor Hadley is doing for Colonel Roosevelt," said Dixon.

Roosevelt Men Seared

The Roosevelt men apparently began to fear the effect of the demonstration as to the fortunes of their candidate and from a dozen directions came a concerted chant of "We want Teddy; we want Teddy."

woman stole the leadership of it and converted the ovation into a Roosevelt demonstration.

But the demonstration did not feaze the Taft strength as a record vote taken immediately after upon a motion to table Governor Deneen's motion to exclude contested delegates from participation in the convention until their cases had been passed upon by the credentials committee showed. Taft's forces mustering 551 votes as against Roosevelt's 510, a gain of 6 votes for the Taft adherents.

During the balloting Governor Johnson of California asserted that the Roosevelt delegates would bolt at the opportune time.

The motion carried viva voce to refer to the committee on credentials Governor Hadley's motion to substitute.

Former Congressman Watson of Indiana closed the debate for the Taft forces. "What I want you delegates to remember in voting on this question," he said, "is that this convention has no right to judge on the merits of these contests. The national committee sat for ten days. It spent much time hearing the evidence. Then by better than a 2 to 1 vote, it made up the temporary roll.

Demonstration for Hadley

"I don't believe in mob law. I am authorized by my friend Governor Hadley to say that he himself is willing, with certain modifications, to send these contests where they belong—to the committee on credentials."

A wild yell went up from the Roosevelt forces at this announcement.

"Let him speak for himself," shouted one hundred voices, and Watson turned and brought Hadley forward.

The Missouri governor stood smiling while the delegates cheered. It was the first real, spontaneous enthusiasm of the convention. More than half of the delegates were on their seats.

Hats were swinging and handkerchiefs were waving while Hadley and Watson, representing the two great factions in the party stood smiling side by side.

For five minutes the demonstration continued and the forces were being augmented every second. Already the Taft men from New York were talking among themselves.

New Jersey Starts Parade

"Looks like they might try to stampede the convention for Hadley," whispered the veteran, Chauncey M. Depew, to William Berry, who stood alongside of him. As this word was passed, James W. Wadsworth waved to his delegates and the members jumped to their chairs yelling, cheering and adding to the din. Part of Indiana joined in the demonstration headed by Jim Hemenway.

Wisconsin and North Dakota sat stolidly in their seats as New Jersey started the procession of the standards around the room. New Jersey's effort was futile for a moment but suddenly a Missouri man grabbed his state standard and started after the New Jersey man. North Carolina followed, then came Kansas and Nebraska.

Oregon Joins Parade

Ohio had seemingly been waiting for the signal and it went on with Oklahoma, West Virginia, Oregon, and California, a part of whose delegates had been stirred by the enthusiasm. The other states were now swinging into line and as Pennsylvania passed the speaker's platform, a wild yell went up. It looked like an old-fashioned stampede, and Hadley and Watson went back to the rear of the platform. A fight started in the center aisle when a New Hampshire deleoff the Hadley demonstration and turn the enthusiasm toward their candidate. They were insisting that they had selected Hadley for second place on the ticket and the demonstration was to this end. But just as they thought they were getting control, W. H. Colman of McKeesport, Pa., jumped to the front, and with a megaphone cried:

Hadley For President.

"Hadley for president; Hadley for president."

It started the cheering all over again and the convention was again the Roosevelt men on the committee and also specifically to deal with the Texas contests. Governor Johnson was to discuss the California contests; George Record of New Jersey, Arizona and Indiana and Henry or Allen the other contests.

Governor Deneen was slated to sum up the case for the Roosevelt men, and also to ask that the Hadley motion be divided so that the vote on California could be taken first.
