SUSPECT LOUNSBERRY'S WIFE

Description Similar The description of Mrs. Lounsberry and the smaller of the two train robbers at Yoncalla are the same in several respects particularly in regard to the face. Wearing apparel similar to that described by the mail clerks was found in the house, but about their discoveries the inspectors were very reticent. However, they would admit nothing in regard to the house even denying the removal of certain jewelry until they saw that further denial was useless as some of Mrs. Stratton's jewelry left by her at the house while cleaning it was among that which they removed. When confronted with this they merely smiled and admitted that they had taken certain jewelry but nothing else, and that they had returned Mrs. Stratton's property.

There no longer remains a doubt but that Lounsberry was the man who conducted the Yoncalla robbery. Not only does his description coincide with that of the larger of the two robbers but his actions on his return to the valley also bear this out. He returned two days after the Yoncalla robbery going through as far as Talent, having overslept on the afternoon train, according to his story. He left the train at Central Point and started to walk out home, a distance of about two miles. Shortly after he left Central Point he was overtaken by Charles Howell who has worked for him a number of times. Mr. Howell offered to carry his suit case in his buggy but Lounsberry declined the offer. He went home and then returned to Victor Bursell's place carrying the suitcase away from the house.

Bursell's Story "Mr. Lounsberry reached the house just at dark," states Mr. Bursell, "and after telephoning to Medford to his wife who was there to meet him" remained to have something to eat with us. We mentioned the Yoncalla robbery but he stated that he knew nothing of it. This is how we remembered his return from the north at that time, two days after the Yoncalla job. During the meal the door slammed shut and he appeared to be very badly frightened. "Who's that?" he exclaimed, "see if somebody is there." We laughed at him and after looking in the kitchen told him it was only a door blowing shut. Later Mrs. Lounsberry came out and they went home.

"Whether Mrs. Lounsberry was gone at the time or not, we do not know. We do not remember seeing her, but sometimes for a week at a time we would not notice whether they were home or not." A story to the effect that Frank Miller, a Central Point carpenter, had built a concealed closet in the house in the attic which has been circulating in Medford for the past day, proved to be without foundation. "I have worked on the house a number of times," stated Mr. Miller at Central Point this morning, "but there is nothing in the attic as far as I know. I did most of the finishing work in the house, building much of the panel work and the like. This work was all solid. The house has been worked over a great deal and is badly patched up but I know nothing of any hidden recesses."
