EAGLE POINT EAGLETS.

(By A. C. Howlett.)

When I last wrote I tried to put in all that I had to say about Hood River, but found on looking over my letter that I had omitted several things that I might have mentioned and among them was the fact they are not cursed with a string of saloons. Another thing was the character of the buildings in the city. The main business buildings are of brick or concrete blocks and show off to a good advantage. And the hotels are generally quite large and well kept, up-to-date, although there are two or three along the street next to the depot that have a very woe-be-gone appearance. The water supply is very good coming from Hood river and that takes its supply from Mt. Hood itself. Another thing that I intended to have mentioned was the fine view we had of Mt. Hood and Mt. Adams while we were riding out over the valley for we traveled almost every direction wending our way around the valley. The city of Hood River is situated about thirty miles from Mt. Hood and about the same distance from Mt. Adams although not in the same direction, the latter can be seen quite plainly from the city while Mt. Hood is hid by the bluff that overhangs the city. The boat landing is about a half a mile above the business part of the town just above the mouth of Hood river so that passengers on the boat have to walk from the boat landing to the city as there are no conveyances to the city, and one has to cross the railroad bridge or else go almost twice as far. But Hood River is a nice place and the people manifest a spirit of kindness toward strangers.

But I promised in this letter to give an account of my trip up to Pendleton and here I am near the half way mark and not a word on the subject of my trip to the country.

Taking the daily car for Pendleton at 10:05 a. m. we continued on up the Columbia river passing two small stations we came to The Dalles this is quite a thriving place and from what I could gather from the car window and questioning one of the brakemen bids fare to be a town of some importance, they are putting a canal and locks here, the canal will be nine miles long, and by that means the boats coming from Portland can continue up the river to Umatilla, and there the railroad leaves the river. Leaving The Dalles we next came to a small station called Dune but about all that was to be seen was a small depot and a few houses, passing on we came to Celilo, here is where the Hill system have the bridge crossing the Columbia for the Oregon Trunk railroad that is supposed to eventually connect with the Pacific & Eastern. As we did not stop but a moment I could not see much of the town but it appears to be a small place. The next place of importance we passed was Sherman, this seemed to be quite a thriving place and from the appearance of the cars on the track there must be considerable business done here. We are now beginning to get into more of a farming country and there seemed to be considerable wheat being shipped. I began to notice as we came east that the country was destitute of timber and that in many places the farmers had planted Bald trees for shade, wood and wind breaks and along the railroad track the company had put up wind brakes of lumber for a long distance and that the sand was drifted up into small mounds and the country was literally covered with sage brush and sand, but I am not supposed to judge the soil from the car windows, for in more than one instance I have been deceived in that line. There seemed to be a sameness all along the route although we kept passing stations every few miles, and there seemed to be short lines of railroads start out every few miles, showing that we were passing through a productive part of the country, for wherever a railroad company builds a road they always have something in sight to justify the investment.

The next place that particularly attracted my attention was Umatilla. This is a railroad center as the roads seem to start from here in several different directions, and there seemed to be more business being done here than any place I had passed since I left Portland, although there are eighteen stations between The Dalles and Umatilla and that is conclusive evidence that I have been passing through a productive country. Passing on we passed through eight stations before we reached Pendleton although we had traveled only forty-four miles. But I see that I am at the end of my usual space but will in my next tell of what I saw and heard in Pendleton and the surrounding country.

VADAL TURKS BOMBARD OLD SACRED MONASTERY

LONDON, Oct. 22.—The bombardment of St. Constantine monastery at Ensinograd by Turkish warships, says a Sofia dispatch to the Times, and the destruction of this venerable and interesting building, the act of gross vandalism which nothing can justify. It may be taken as an omen of the character of the struggle which civilized Europe has failed to prevent, says the dispatch. The monastery was formerly the residence of Prince Alexander and subsequently of King Ferdinand.
