CIVIL COURTS SUPERCEDED.

(Continued from page 1.) the provost marshal and without warrant of authority except that conferred by the military code. Elliott also said that the militia was still rounding up high-powered rifles, and repeatedly insisted that martial law was necessary as the civil authorities were unable to cope with the situation. It was believed certain that drastic action will result from the investigation. Senator Borah of Idaho dominated the situation and his cross-examination of Elliott was sharp and severe.

State of War Existed

Elliott said that when his troops first entered the strike zone they confiscated 120,000 rounds of ammunition and six machine guns which the operators had taken into the district. He also described a pitched battle between mine guards and miners, in which several towns were "shot up" and property destroyed. The witness declared that both parties were responsible for outbreaks. He said that when the first period of martial law was ended, some of the militiamen became guards. When martial law was resumed, he said, these men resumed their military service. Elliott asserted that martial law was first proclaimed at the request of the union representatives, who declared mine guards were carrying things in a high-handed manner, and that even the mine operators were opposed to their tactics. Captain Morgan, of the state militia, was the next witness. He testified that in the opinion of himself and associate officers, an actual state of war existed in the Point Creek and Cabin Creek districts, and that they had governed sentences accordingly. "We had to make examples of the offenders," he said. "If we had believed life imprisonment necessary we would have imposed that sentence regardless of the civil code. We also sentenced persons for offenses committed before martial law was proclaimed." Captain Morgan also explained the methods of the court martial. Legal blanks for sale at the Mail Tribune office.
