Socialist Defines the Difference

To the Editor:

Referring to Tribune editorial June 21st, "What's The Difference,"

Your correspondent has information that the Glendale bank robber was not a socialist party member. Whether he was or not, has nothing to do with socialist ethics and principles. His act finds no authority in socialist teaching.

The socialist constitution and platform express what socialists stand for. These were submitted to the party membership for referendum and adopted in their present form; clauses not approved were rejected.

The editor is challenged to show that the socialist party advocates "syndicalism," "direct action" or "sabotage." It is not denied that many socialists believe in using these methods to combat injustice and violence perpetrated upon labor in industries where long hours, bad working conditions, insufficient wages and "speeding up" exist. These methods have been used by labor unions in their conflicts with capital prior to the founding of the socialist party, and independent of socialists since then. Socialism is not responsible for such form of "direct action" which is but the natural and immediate effect of the cause—the exploitation of labor by capital under the capitalist system.

The editor is sensitive over the question of "confiscation." United States history is but a record of confiscation. The revolutionists confiscated the original states from England. We confiscated vast territory from Mexico, and the slaves of the south, all by armed force.

Our natural resources and our industries have been confiscated by a combination of fraud and of legal procedure. The result is concentration of wealth and power in a few hands, while the masses are propertyless victims of the industrial system we permit to exist.

Socialism advocates "collective ownership" and "democratic control" of industry; a "co-operative commonwealth." Both purchase and "confiscation" are suggested methods of effecting the change; the referendum to determine methods.

Many socialists believe collective ownership of natural resources (gift of nature), and industry, (which no individual, but which society as a whole has brought to its high state of efficiency), should be established through so-called "confiscation"; such individuals holding that such an act would be but restitution to the people of that which is their natural birth-right and that which they have created, and which has been confiscated from them by the present owners.

Socialism and socialists, stand for and advocate a radical change in our social system. When the majority is converted to socialism, it will determine how to effect the change from capitalism to socialism.

In conclusion I submit to the editor's thoughtful consideration the following definitions of socialism:

"The ethics of Socialism are identical with the ethics of Christianity."—Encyclopedia Britannica.

"Socialism is a theory of society that advocates a more precise and harmonious arrangement of the social relations of mankind than that which has hitherto prevailed."—Webster's Dictionary.

Respectfully,
G. R. SATCHWELL,
Medford, Ore., June 23, 1913.
