He announced that he had been engaged in the anti-saloon work for the past twenty years, and was on his way from the Willamette valley, where he had been engaged at six of the towns that had been fighting for freedom from the curse of the saloon, and that he had won out in five out of the six towns he had been working in. His main topic was the great wrong inflicted on the people by the license system, claiming that the supreme court of the United States had decided that no men or set of men had a right to license anyone to commit a crime, and that the licensing of any one to run a saloon was granting him the right to debauch his fellow man. His lecture was interspersed kent the audience constantly interested for an hour and a half.
