HOME AND FARM MAGAZINE SECTION

The Reign of the Automobile

By Myra Nye,

LIZABETH GLENNEN glaneed Jerry stood at the corral gate with cars down her pergola's sun-splashed pricked forward, and Jane, with feminperspective with longing eyes. It ine inquisitiveness, thrust her nose was not so much its shade she desired, through the bars. They regarded the though the September sun pushed the intruder and usurper with an air of remercury-no true Californian would sorve.

care to say how high; but it was with When throbs and sputters and jerka longing for the work that the shade ing sounds subdued sufficiently, George entailed. Her flower-lover's fingers fairly trembled in their eagerness to managed to say flurriedly: "Elizabeth, let me present Mr. Mas-

"Pleased to meet you, Mr. Masters."

real cotate, and he was a truthful man notwithstanding his calling and the place of his calling. Beth Glennea could sing Los Robles' praise in tune

Later, when the two men turned toward the cerral gate and George lowered the bars, mother and daughter with one accord walked slowly to the house, not once glancing at the new possession that monopolized the driveway. "I just can't bear to see dear old Jane and Jerry go, mother!" "Neither can I, dear." In the instant Elizabeth regretted her sympathy; for sensitive little Beth broke

When Mr. Masters drove out of the yard, a sound suspiciously like a sob came from the screen porch. Elizabeth

"Beth is broken-hearted, George.

"Poor little girl, she did love Jane

"Yes, and so do L." George smiled

With George's arms around both

"The best medicine for the dumps is a ride. Let the figs go to the bees, let my ironing go. It's too hot to iron, anyway. My sprengeri is all pot bound.

Never mind, let it go. We can afford to let anything go. We are rich. We own an automobile."

George had already mastered the steering wheel, the gear shifting levers and the brakes. The three ventured for le in the big house on the hill. Often the whole day was spent in riding.

turned to her husband.

What shall we dof"

and Jerry so." "So do L."

away and ran sobbing into the house.

with her father.

be removing dead leaves and staking bending stalks; but heat or not heat, ters." the figs must be preserved or the silly Elizabeth's provincial reply had at linnets would get every one. She turned resolutely from the artis least feminine composure under exciting circumstances. Neither she nor Beth was going to be indecently jubilant be-Bie, home-made pergola, went down the path, paused at the corral fence to give Ferry a friendly pat. Once through fore a stranger when it was a matter of trade. They had been in California the gate she pushed Jane's intrusive real estate business too long for that. nose from her shoulder so that she Not that they were going to lead this might get the ladder lying against the fashionable easterner to suppose this barn. She had not quite mounted to was the first car that ever came into the top when a bell ringing made her their yard. Even Beth could have told pause. Beth, lingering behind to hunt him that Los Robles had more autos basket for the figs, called insistently: mobiles for its size than any town in the state. This was one of her father's "Telephone, mother, telephone!" "Oh, dear!" It was a disgusted exelamation that fell from her lips as Elizabeth set the basket down on the top step of the ladder among the bees and fragrant Smyrnas. She gathered her skirt in one hand, descended and teached the telephone with character-

A' Hello!"

"Oh, it's you, George." "What-what did you say?" It was an italicized exclamation more than ention.

"Oh, George, isn't that fine?"

"Do I like it? I should say so. It is simply great! What good times we will have. Come here as quick as you gan. I must tell Beth."

Click went back the receiver, and Elizabeth turned to her little daughter, her blue eyes black with excitement and eagernees.

"What do you think, girlie, father has a new-guess what." "Oh, mother, I can't guess; tell me. "

"No, you must guess. What would you rather have than anything else !" "A little baby sister. Goodie! Will he bring it home right now?" ruefully, then he called out to Beth: The quick change in her mother's "Come her, little girl, and I'll tell you expression made her eagerness lessen a how it happened.' degree. "Isn't it a really, truly baby; pr is it just a doll?" "his girls" they walked through the

"Neither, Beth. What made you cooler pergola, he talked to them, until Elizabeth said:

Well, you said that father was go ing to make a deal with Dr. Strong today, so I thought of course it would be a baby." Beth's creatfallen face escaped a pout only because the cor-ners of her mouth were not made to turn down.

Elizabeth herself felt a slight abate-ment in her enthusiasm. "It is an automobile," she said.

Beth looked at her mother with big their first ride. It was a joy! This parnest brown eyes widening into a guestioning gaze which her mother sould not interpret as gladness. "Why, don't you like it, Beth? Aren't you glad? It is a great big tourlog car."

"Yes-I-I'm glad, but mother, will we have to sell Jane and Jerry ?"

"Yes, I suppose we will, but just think of the fun we will have. We can go everywhere we want to, we can take neighbors.

But this year the days followed one another with none of the white figs preserved in ginger, or the purple ones with lemon. The apricots had yellowed the ground, the peaches fell bruised while the fruit shelves went empty. This was the reign of the automobile. The sprengerei ceased to send out its quick-growing fronds. The begonia leaves curled and lost their luster; the pergola changed from a cool retreat to common, home-made clutter; the walnuts lay upon the ground ungathered, while the muscat grapes refused to be come raisins, but mildewed on the roof for the lack of Elizabeth's care.

Yet there were rides! They sped through the white moonlight; over the prone, purple shadows of the eucalyp-tus-bordered roads. They whirled past acres and acres of oranges where fitful far breezes came winnowing through the smells of the many fragrant groves. They rode to the very base of the marvelous Sierra Madres till the time when the snow fell on the mountains. Then the amethystine glow of the peaks grew white-they were alabaster steps lead-ing through the azure to the throne of the Most High.

stock pieces of information in selling No matter what the joy upon the road, the home coming was never quite the same as it had been in the fugitive spring days which they remembered with Jane and Jerry.

"How can we help missing them? We loved them so," Elizabeth said. "Why, we began loving them as soon as we were married when we took our wedding trip after them down to San Diego. The first time Beth ever left house when she was a baby was to ride after them. They were always the best sort of company. "All summer when I have frightened away the birds, the first friends I saw in the morning were Jane and Jerry Every morning till they went away they would stick their dear old none through the bars and show me that they were as glad to see me as I was to see them. Jane would nicker up to me on the sleeping porch and may Good morning' as plain as could be But now that dead, ugly auto stands there and does nothing, just like an old dummy. Even when we ride in it, it is not as cony as our little road wagon used to be with Jane and Jerry in front of us three. Beth and I bump around on that big back seat like two popeorns in a popper. Jane and Jerry are alive, alive! An auto is nothing but dead." Elizabeth ended passionately, and a purpose crystalized in George's mind. A short twilight was already shading its gray into the black dark of early winter. The fog was drifting in, bandaging the trees like cotton gauze. The lamps of the automobile must be lighted before Glennen started. Like a great black beetle, the machine at first crawled from under the pepper tree, then took wings and flew down the avenue of innumerable peppers. Elizabeth watched its flight through devouring of space made them greedy for more. So each night for a week found them on the road. No lamplight shone through the windows of the little country bungalow to cheer the old peo ple in the high home on the hill. Ofter scent reminded her of a spring ride with Jane and Jerry to the Puents Hills, where the maidenhair forms were One day George came home in the Hills, where the maidenhair ferns were middle of the forencon, an unusual like a carpet to tread upon in the middle of the forenoon, an unusual mail canyon. There the yellow violets, thing with him. He was white and his small canyon. There the yellow violets, hands were trembling. Elizabeth hur-shooting stars and lupine studded the away the thieving linnets. It was by bacon and frijoles reached out to such vigilance that Elizabeth had, each George Glannon returning. The small year, a crop that was the wondar of her added seet to the satisfaction of his planned surprise. The gleam paths of light held the moving shadows of the two whom he loved, to whom brought joy.

Elizabeth stopped suddenly as she re-turned from her last trip to the supboard.

"Listen! Someone is coming WITH HORSES!"

"Jane and Jerry!"

Elizabeth put down the cake plate and followed Beth's dash through the door.

"Father! Father!" Beth's voice pierced the night with its blear, glad troble, and Elizabeth's alto was just as cager.

"George!"

"Yes, yes," came the answer. "Here we are; hurry up!"

It was superfluous instruction. With unerring footsteps in the dark they reached the open space by the corral, Elizabeth's arms went around Jerry's neck, while Beth shouted:

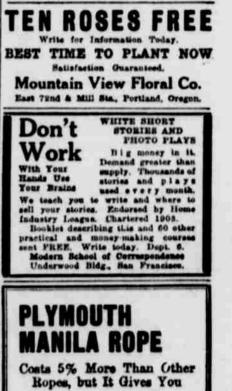

"Lift me up, lift me up on Jane's back, so I can hug her good! Jana, dear Jane! Oh, Janey dear, have you come back to stay?"

"They are ours. I bought them In the lantern light the husbank." band and father watched these two cager children with amused fondness.

"How good it is to have them here! But did you have to lose in the trada, Georget''

"No, no loss. Anything is valuable according to how much you want it. I paid a little sum for experience, but that always comes high, you know. Anyway, I wouldn't take two autos for just one of Jane, let alone Jerry." "Neither would II" chorused Elisabeth.

If asparagus has turned yellow it ought to be cut out and burned. It will kill spores of rust, which should be disposed of before they are ripe enough to be scattered by the wind.

25% LONGER LIFE AND STRENGTH.

sorved gladness. They talked it over at length with increasing interest till the sound of a Gabriel horn made them pause. With lips rounded for ready explanation they gazed for an instant through the open door in silence. "There's our automobile!" Beth's mentance was pregnant with ownership Her siender form slipped through the screen door before Elizabeth could reach it. Her good fellowship with eth great naw possesion should appear. Under the big pepper tree, with its and its red berries aircady littering the toomeau, the shining, respinendent the modent four-roomed bungalow and the still gover owned bungalow and the still gover erwirked in the sunlight to frights.
--